To a Protestant-American whose church service has always consisted in seeing his pastor preach and pray and pass around the hat, this may seem a peculiar and extravagant form of worship. But when we think of the battles which have been fought by men for the right to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences, we should criticise no people for the manner in which they worship God. When we think deeper and realize that religion is the life of God in the soul of man, and realize that the expression of this religion and forms of worship are mere matters of education, we must not be surprised at any form or manner in which a man gives expression to his religion. Wherever there is a human soul striving for communion with its God there is a holy church, and let all men stand with uncovered heads and be willing to bow their knees. No expression of religion in the life of a righteous man should seem ridiculous or useless to one who wants to see men become better. We cannot think of the Heavenly Father as being much interested in the manner or form in which his children worship him. It is only character and love, the choice fruits of human life, that man can hold up to his God. If a man can be better by worshiping God with forms and imposing ceremonies, let no one put a stumbling-block in his way. Antwerp is better for the existence of this large Catholic cathedral and its thousands of members in its midst.

Many other interesting things are to be seen in Antwerp, Belgium. The old Spanish prison, erected in the eleventh century, still stands. Buildings and streets of the old Antwerp of centuries ago are relics of much interest. Here in Antwerp is said to be one of the largest zoological gardens in the world. We had a delightful visit through it. It was like a trip to a big circus where you could see all kinds of animals. I don't see how Noah ever got so many different animals in one ark; and some of them I don't see why he put in at all. What did Noah want to save a pair of flies and mosquitoes for? And why did he save the poodle-dog? Surely he did not bring a pair of poodle-dogs to amuse his wife, for I believe if Noah had caught his wife going with a poodle-dog, he would have thrown him overboard, and we would not now have so many dirty, sore-eyed poodle-dogs winning the affections of the women away from the men.

But the greatest feast we had in Antwerp was our visit to historical art galleries. Here in Antwerp in 1577 was born Peter Paul Rubens, the greatest painter of the Flemish school of art; and I understand that artists call him a big painter. The house in which he was born still stands, and to a sentimental, art-appreciating man, it would be a big thing to see this house. We visited the famous Rubens' art gallery in which are most of Rubens' renowned paintings. To look at a famous picture makes some people have an esthetic fit, but most of the time it makes me blush to see fine art. Artists are not modest. Ever since man cut his eye-teeth upon the forbidden apple and became wise and wicked, and modest enough to want to hide his nakedness, artists have been trying to take his clothes from him, until to-day the finest and most artistic statues of man are left with but a single leaf to tell the story of the Garden of Eden. Antwerp was also the home and birthplace of the famous artists, Van Dyck and Jordaens, and their works of art are also preserved in the Rubens gallery.

In conclusion, we would advise people who land at Antwerp not to hurry out of town until they have seen what the Belgians have got to show in Antwerp.

The Impolitic Monkey.

A monkey once decided upon a visit to a foreign country. In due course, having arrived at his destination, he immediately proceeded to exhibit extreme and contemptuous surprise at the manners and customs of the animals he found there.

"Now, look here," said he to a horse. "My whiskers! but you are a queer lot of beasts. Just think of not being able to hang on to the bough of a tree by your tail. Why, in monkeyland everyone can do that."

"Indeed," replied the horse, who felt it incumbent upon him to be polite to a stranger. "Is that so? Well, I suppose you are all very clever beasts in monkeyland."

"Oh, yes, of course," acquiesced the monkey, turning up his nose with a disdainful air, "and I'll tell you another thing. You haven't the least conception of the proper way to spring here."

"We have not?" returned the horse, with a touch of irony in his voice.

"No," continued the monkey. "Why, it makes me grin when I think of it. I saw a dog jump after a rabbit the other day, and you should have seen the exhibition he made of himself."

"I should certainly not have cared to do so," replied the horse, decisively, "because the dog happens to be a great friend of mine."

"Is he?" laughed the monkey. "Oh, what a beast to choose for a friend. Why, we don't think anything of dogs in monkeyland. We just regard them as lower creatures. But, tell me, why in the world do you sleep on the ground instead of in trees, as we do in my country?"

"Because it is not our custom," replied the horse, suppressing a sharp retort with difficulty.

"It is! Well, I don't want to live here," retorted the monkey.

"You will pardon me," replied the horse, in a dignified tone, "but you certainly are not bound to remain."

"Now, that is insulting," complained the monkey, "really, very rude and ill-bred indeed."

The horse opened his eyes wide in astonishment. "I suppose it does not occur to you," said he, "that your criticisms of our way of doing things are even more so. Honestly, unless you can conform to our customs, I think you had better run swiftly back to your own country."

Then he went on with his grazing.

"They are an ignorant, uncouth set, these beasts," reflected the monkey. "I'll be shot if I can make any friends among them."

The moral of this fable is easily found: If you desire to make friends in a foreign country, above all things avoid derogatory comparisons.—Pets and Animals.

How Zulu Women Sew.

The skill of the Zulu of South Africa in sewing fur is a household word in South Africa, and some of the other tribes compete with them. The needle employed is widely different from that used by the ordinary needlewoman. In the first place, it has no eye; in the second, it is like a skewer, pointed at one end and thick at the other.

The thread is not of cotton, but is made of the sinews of various animals, the best being made from the sinews in the neck of a giraffe. It is stiff, inelastic, with a great tendency to "kink" and tangle itself up with anything near it. Before being used it is steeped in hot water until it is quite soft, and is then beaten between two smooth stones, which causes it to separate into filaments, which can thus be obtained of any strength and thickness. Thus the seamstress has a considerable amount of labor before she commences with the real work in hand.

Finally she squats on the ground (for no native stands to work, or do anything else, who can possibly help it) and, taking her needle, bores two holes in the edges of the rug or garment on which she is working. The thread is then pushed through with the butt of the needle, drawn tightly and two more holes are made with a like result, the skewer progressing very slowly compared with an English needlewoman, but fast enough for a country where time is of no value whatever.

The skin upon which the seamstress is working is dampened with water before she commences, and as the damp thread and hide dry out it brings the work very closely together. This is carefully attended to, and the work is not allowed to get dry until finished, when the seamstress lays it flat upon the ground, pulling it this way and that and mixing and arranging the hair for several hours, until, the skin being generally dry, it is impossible to find the joint or hem with the naked eye.—St. Louis Journal of Agriculture.

A Ballad of Kinsmen.

Apia Bay wears a smooth, bright face
When the tropic winds are low,
But the harbor curve is a fearsome place
When the great winds rise and blow.

'Tis perilous for barks to ride
At anchor, when the surge
Comes thundering in from the sea outside
And foams on the rocky verge.

From the western states three ships were there.
And one from the English Isle;
They came when the skies were bland and fair
And the ocean ways a smile.

But the fierce storm smote them, till they tossed
Like chips 'twixt sea and sky;
And two of the ships of the States were lost
And the other drifted nigh

The coral reefs, to death; but saw
The sturdy English ship
Out from the harbor's seething maw
Toward open water slip.

And sore they yearned to follow her
Beyond the barrier foam,
To swap their coral sepulcher
For the sea-leagues leading home;

But the ill-starred Trenton could not sail
Nor steam; with beams aburst,
A helpless hulk before the gale
She staggered toward the Worst.

Yet, as the English, inch by inch,
Away from the shallows drew,
The boys of the States, they did not flinch,
For they cheered the other crew.

Yea, never a soul showed craven then,
Though their fate was plain to see;
The doomed men waved to the luckier men
And gave them three times three.

Three times three, and the cheer rang high
Above the wind and the wave,
As the English ship strained safely by,
And the other on to her grave!

Oh, blood will tell, they were kinsmen all!
Give the gallant lads a place
On the good high-seats of the heroes' hall
To kindle our common race!

The Army Mule.

The army mule in the Philippine warfare is one of the most important factors in the campaign. The mule can be depended upon to go into places where horses cannot, even if loaded with considerable weight in rations, equipments and articles of the soldier in general. The writer has accompanied several expeditions over the roughest portions of the country in the Philippines with military expeditions, and in each case the mule has proved himself a capable and faithful carrier of burdens. At first it was intended to use the mules principally for hauling rations and soldiers' outfits over the mountains in places where the regular ox teams of the country could not be taken. But the mule is used for the artillery and for the purpose of hauling escort wagons filled with commissary stores, to the amount of over 4,000 pounds oftentimes, light wagons for mail, orders, officers' luggage when the latter change stations, and for hundreds of other purposes essential to warfare in a country where there are no railroads or effective means of transportation, and where the roads are exceedingly bad. The writer has seen the mules tugging away at the wagons, heavily loaded, in places where he ordinary horse or ox would fail utterly. The mule is very ambitious to succeed in getting over the rough places in the roads in this country. The horses of the Philippines are at the best very inferior little animals, and are seldom used by the army in connection with transportation. If mules cannot be abtained, the quartermaster's department makes an effort to secure bull teams from the natives, the hire per day of which amounts to two dollars Mexican money for each team. A native driver accompanies the carts and attends to the feeding of the bull or caribon. These animals are of course very slow, but they are strong and steady and if given the time will haul considerable of a load for a long distance.

The army mule in the Philippines usually covers about fifteen miles per day over moderately level country, but if the weather is favorable, and the sun not too hot, longer distances can be covered. The sun gets very severe overhead after 10 o'clock in the morning, and the drivers usually arrange to start early in the morning so as to get as far as possible before the heat of the day sets in. Then a rest is taken until 3 o'clock in the afternoon, when a new start is made and the balance of the trip made before dark. Mules are sometimes permanently injured by overdriving during the heated part of the day and drop by the roadside, completely exhausted, and are perfectly useless for several days. A careless driver can easily permanently injure a mule by this sort of work, and there are in every stable in the Philippines from one to a dozen of the animals recovering from overdriving during the heated portion of the day.

Mules are faithful animals in many ways, one of which is in the manner in which they cross streams. The bridges of the rivers in the Philippines have either been burned by the insurgents or are useless for lack of repairs, and the army ration trains are obliged to pass through the rivers by wading the mules. The wagons usually sink to the hub and often deeper. Frequently the mules step into holes, but instead of floundering about as most horses would the mule quietly extricates himself. It is very seldom that the mules take fright or run away. In crossing one river recently a portion of it was found to be very deep and it was necessary to build a bamboo raft. This raft supported the first team, but the second one was a four-mule outfit and the additional weight caused the raft to sink at one end and allow the wagon to run off at one side, carrying with it the four mules and the driver. The latter got free but the harness of the mules kept the animals from getting away, and two of them went down for good. The other two secured a footing for their forefeet on the edge of the raft, and remained there perfectly quiet for nearly an hour while the soldiers rigged up another raft on which the rules were finally rescued.

The few bridges which are in use in the Philippines are mostly very narrow, hardly wider than the wheels of the wagon, and are in most cases without side rails, so that in driving over with a four-mule team the driver usually pulls in one of the leaders so as to guide the pole with the shaft mules. But often the wheels sink into the bridge, and as one side goes down the momentum imparted to the driver on the seat causes the springs of the latter to throw the seat up suddenly, often so high as to tip the driver off and cause the reins to become entangled. Horses might take fright at this, and the forward pair springing for the opposite end of the bridge would cause the wagon to shift its position and probably go over. Therefore the army mule in being steady, is a valuable animal for drawing the heavy wagons over the narrow bridges.

I have seen mules started out with expeditions on the artillery, shifted from the artillery to the wagon trains, and finally used for packing purposes. The artillery, as is well known to mule drivers, ordinarily impairs a mule for future service on the wagons or the pack trains, for the reason that in drilling with the guns the mules are necessarily kept at hard practice, consisting in starting out at a fast pace and keeping up the run until all are winded. This affects the wind of the animal for hauling purposes, so that as soon as a hill is reached, his wind is cut short much quicker than would have happened under other conditions of use. But the Philippine war mule is obliged to be content with all kinds of work. He is up and at it all the time. In following the enemy the mule has but little rest, and that mostly in the middle of the day, as the night is used very much for traveling purposes, especially if the weather is favorable.

The mule seems to get along comfortably in all sorts of weather. In dry weather he thrives well on the scanty grass along the roads and he can go quite a long time without water. He is issued regular rations and the teamsters always take care to draw the proper allotment when the journey begins. The mule being tall as compared with the horse and other animals of haulage in these islands, has a great advantage in that he can wade deep and wet places in roads and pastures without trouble to himself. He is high up above everything.

The trains are often fired upon by the enemy, but for the reason that the insurgents think that there is a Gatling or similar gun in each wagon they seldom come very close. However, the rattling fire which the insurgents often pour into a train on the road or which is encamped for the night, seldom disturbs the mules. I have seen mules continue to walk steadily with a load under a severe fire, paying no attention to the shooting. What would stampede untrained horses does not seem to interest the mules. They are a good animal in a fight, unless it is at night, when the sight of the flashes seems to disturb them. The mules in the Philippines are of a high quality, having been selected for this special work.—The National Stockman.

Brave But Frightened.

Mr. Richard Harding Davis, who has acted as war correspondent in five campaigns, the last being that in South Africa, writes in Everybody's Magazine about the Curiosities of Courage. Men do strange things when they are frightened, but it does not follow that a man is a coward because he recognizes danger and trembles with fear. Mr. Davis says:

Indeed, personally, I find my sympathy is entirely against the man "who doesn't know fear." I consider him a dull soul without any imagination. The man who does know it I rate higher; his courage is finer, and I would class him as the type of the bravest man.

There is the story of the bullying colonel who turned on one of his aides during a battle and cried, "Captain ———, you are frightened! You are, sir! You are scared!" "You're right," replied the captain; "and if you were half as scared as I am, you'd be six miles in the rear."

When Pa Goes up to Town.

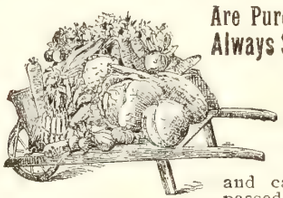
Ma gets up awful early, 'long 'bout three or four o'clock,
And wakes the hired man so he can milk and feed the stock.
And lights the kitchen fire then, and grinds the coffee mill,
And bangs the pots and lids around the stove just fit to kill!
And when she puts the mush pan on and sets the table chairs,
She stands down at the kitchen-door and calls to me upstairs;
"Now, Bob, just you get up to once and dress and hurry down;
There's lots to do this morning, for pa's going up to town!"

'T won't do to lie a-bed such times; obedience is best;
And so I rummage in the dark and pretty soon I'm drest;
And when I get downstairs there's pa a-stormin' round the place,
Because the water ain't got hot for him to shave his face.
And ma, she sets me to luggin' wood, and sis, she comes down late
Just awful cross; and ma, she says, indignant-like: "Now, Kate,
There ain't no use your being cross. You'd better tell young Brown
To stay away the night before your pa goes up to town!"

Then pa he cuts an awful gash, and ma says serves him right:
"There ain't no sense in trying for to shave by candle light!"
And pa he swears and kicks the cat, and ma she busies round
And gets some spider's web and stuff and plasters up the wound;
And then the mush it goes and burns 'cause no one's watching it,
And ma she grabs it off the stove just like she had a fit,
"Good gracious, Kate! I s'pose you'd stand and watch the house burn down!
It does seem like you'd help a bit when pa goes up to town!"

Pa hurries through his breakfast, 'cause there ain't much time to spare,
And growls because the coffee's weak, as cross as any bear;
Sis says she "isn't hungry;" ma she sniffs and stirs her cup,
And Jerry he comes in and says pa'd better hurry up.

* * * * *



And when they're gone I sneak away out to the barn and crawl
Into the mow and burrow down 'way over nigh the wall;
And there I lie and sleep and sleep till dinner comes aroun', Gee! home's a mighty restful place when pa's gone up to town!" —Puck.

PETE.

X.—Pete's Punishment.

Everything happens at last, if you just wait; and if it doesn't happen to you, it does to somebody else. And one of the things that is always sure to come around before you want it, is the time to get up. Mrs. Morris was not one of those ladies who get up before day, and then pretend that they like it. She arose at seven and she didn't care who knew it. Some people grope out of bed in the darkness, stumble about the house by lamplight, and then crow over those who don't have to get up at such unseasonable hours. You would think to hear them, that they had to get up to wind up the sun and set the earth to rotating. Jennie made the kitchen fire, and started outdoors to get some water to put in the teakettle. She uttered a cry and her mother came to the door to look out; and there sat Pete on a hencoop, barefooted and very wide awake. Yes, it was Pete! But how had she escaped from her bedroom, the door of which was locked, with the key on the outside? If it had been earlier, Mrs. Morris might have thought it a ghost. But who ever saw a ghost at seven in the morning? Besides, Mrs. Morris stared so hard at the child that, had it really been a ghost, the lady must certainly have seen entirely through her. "Pete!"

"Mamma," said Pete jumping up, "come on; you might as well know the worst at first." She darted around the corner, and her mother and Jennie followed. Pete pointed to the bedclothes that hung from the upstairs window. "I slided down," she said. Of course she knew better than "slided," but when you are very much disturbed, you are apt to say curious words.

"Jennie," said Mrs. Morris, "run up and pull in those things before the neighbors see them. Oh, Pete, Pete! What ever will become of you, my poor, bad little girl!"

"I don't know," said the child; "I guess maybe being called 'Pete' has something to do with it. Don't you think it has a wicked sound?"

"It was your grandfather's name," said Mrs. Morris. "He used to call you that when you were a baby. I was so disappointed that you were not a boy that he said, 'Never mind, call her Pete!' "

"Mamma, I was disappointed, too, because I wasn't a boy. I wish I had of been!"

"Oh, Prudence, if you would only be good, then it wouldn't matter."

"Mamma, if I was good, I'd only be a good girl."

"Come in the house, Prudence." Mrs. Morris was very sad and that made Pete cry. "Tell me what you have been doing—everything; let me know the worst." She sat down by the kitchen table and the girl stood guiltily before her. By this time Jennie had returned, and she stood looking at her little sister as if she thought her a mistake in Geometry. Madge came downstairs, and sat on the carpet in the dining room (which was next door), where she could button her shoes and hear what was going on.

"I had promised Nap," said Pete (Mrs. Morris shuddered), "to bring him this morning all the nice things we girls have, and maybe he'd go away and never bother you any more a-tall, mamma, and I couldn't get the other things, so I just took my bracelet and ring and slid down the bedclothes, and I had to go 'cause I'd promised, and I knew if I got him to go 'way, it would pay for ever'thing. He wouldn't take my things and he said he wouldn't go 'way and he tried to put me off by telling me the interestingest story you ever heard about Elvira, a little girl in a haunted house, and ever' night they heard 'Thump, thump, thump" right down the steps and his hair all raised on end and she scrootched in a corner and it was twelve o'clock, midnight."

"What made that noise?" demanded Madge, poising her buttonhook in the air.

"I wouldn't even let him tell, I's so anxious to beg him to go 'way, but he wouldn't. And then I did what Brother Temples said."

"What do you mean?" demanded Mrs. Morris.

"Don't you know he said ever'body ought to try to get somebody to be a Christian, 'cause God would ask um if they'd ever tried to save a soul; so I went to work with Nap and did what I could, like it says somewhere in the Bible, to be a light to the Gentiles. And I guessed he was a Gentile if they is any Gentiles, now. But he wouldn't make any promises. So I came away. And here I am," she added.

"Pete, you knew I was grieved and wounded the other time you went to this person who calls himself 'Nap.' "

"Yes, mamma, but I'd promised. But I know I've been bad. Mamma, I haven't got anything to say, except that I won't do it any more."

"Oh, Prudence," said the little woman despairingly, "What can I do with you?"

"Lock me up, mamma. Starve me!"

"I tell you, mamma," volunteered Madge, "you ought to be like Miss Dollie. I believe whippings are best. I don't believe we mind being locked up so much—unless we want real bad to be some other place."

"Mamma," said Pete, "I wish you would tell Madge to 'tend to her own business!"

"Well, I was just saying what I thought was best," said Madge calmly. "I don't believe locking-ups are as good as whippings."

"If it was you," said Pete with spirit, "you'd talk different, Miss Madge!"

"For what you have done, my child," said Mrs. Morris sadly, "you must be punished. I know it grieves me as much as it does you. No, I will not lock you up this time. Neither will I whip you. I have tried to raise you without beating you—forcing you by physical means to do what is right. I have tried to show you that the reward of doing right is the love of your friends and their respect and esteem." Pete began to sob. "But it seems that you must be taught by severe lessons what is best for you. Next Friday evening—"

"Oh, mamma!" cried Madge. "I wouldn't do that!"

"Next Friday evening," repeated Mrs. Morris firmly, "happens to be Linda May's birthday. She is going to give a little party. You and Madge are invited."

"Oh, mamma, don't say it," cried Madge, who suspected what was coming, "because if you say it, you know you'll stick to it!"

"Hush, Madge!" said Jennie. "Mamma is right."

"Yes," said Mrs. Morris, "I believe I am. And so, Prudence, you must stay at home from the party." Pete wailed.

"Oh, mamma!" said Madge. "It's the only party Linda May ever had, and I just had to beg and beg Miss Dollie. It's the occasion of Linda May's life, and she won't be happy if Pete ain't there, I know she won't! Please don't say she can't go."

"There is no use to discuss it," was the firm reply. "Come, we are late. We must hurry with our breakfast."

"I'd like to know," said Pete, "who wants any breakfast, when it is ready." Without waiting to be enlightened on this point, she ran upstairs and threw herself on her bed and sobbed and wailed at the thought of Linda May's party. "Pete!" said a voice at the bedside. Pete only wailed. "Pete!"

Desperate gasps and sobs. "PETE!"

"Well, what is it?"

"I'll tell you what I'll do," said Madge; "you know they have ice cream and candy and things, so you never want your orange; so I'll put mine to one side and bring it to you."

Jesus in Gethsemane.

The account of the Lord's Supper closes with the words, "And when they had sung an hymn, they went out unto the Mount of Olives." The hymn with which Jesus and his disciples closed the Passover supper was probably Psalms 115 to 118, with which it was customary to bring the feast to a close. With the words, "Blessed be he that cometh in the name of the Lord: we have blessed you out of the house of the Lord . . . Bind the sacrifice with cords, even unto the horns of the altar," still echoing in their ears, the disciples followed their Master out into the night, in whose shadows the awful struggle should take place which should lead to the final sacrifice of infinite love. Despite the tender prayer that the eleven had heard Jesus offer up for them, in that upper room, they yet failed to understand the tragedy about to be enacted, and the peril that already threatened their faith. As they passed out of the city gate, and wended their way across the Kedron valley, Jesus warned them of the coming danger and their own cowardice; but they could not believe that it was possible for them ever to deny or desert him whom they loved so truly. So little do we know our own hearts. A possible traitor lurks in every one of us. Let us humbly watch and pray lest we enter into temptation.

The little company soon entered the garden of Gethsemane, some enclosed spot on one of the lower slopes of the Mount of Olives, where there was an oil press used for extracting the precious oil of the olives which grew abundantly there. The name Gethsemane signifies an oil press. A fitting place this, among the olives, emblem of peace, for the Prince of Peace to pass through the awful, silent struggle with the outposts of the enemy, and to win the victory which should make sure the conquest of the cross and tomb. The world was asleep under the clear Passover moon when Jesus entered the shade of the olive trees, whither he had often before resorted for rest and prayer. He bade the little company sit down beneath the trees and await his return. Then, taking the three favorite disciples with him, he went a little farther into the shadows. And now the gloom deepened over his soul. He felt that this was the hour of the Prince of Darkness, and the bitter cup was about to be pressed to his lips. The pathos of the scene is too deep for words; it calls for tears and sympathy alone. He who had suffered so long and patiently and never complained, he who seemed ever to be giving and never needing sympathy, now made a piteous appeal to his disciples: "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death: abide ye here and watch with me." Poor, lone sufferer, thou canst not have even the poor support of human sympathy in thine hour of darkness. Thou must tread the wine press alone. Thy nearest friends will sleep through thine anguish, and will flee when thine enemies approach. The willing spirit shall not conquer the weakness of the flesh, until thy redeeming work is done, and a dying and risen Christ shall impart his spirit of courage and truth to all believers.

A stone's throw from the sleeping disciples lies the Savior, prone upon the ground. Agonizing sobs and cries break from his lips, and his arms are thrown toward the skies in frantic pleading. "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass away from me," he cries. Thrice he utters this agonizing appeal, ever humbly adding, "Nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt." The evangelists emphasize the awful sufferings of our Lord in this dread hour. He was "sore amazed," and "greatly troubled," and in the stress of his agony the very blood from his veins mingled with the sweat that dropped from his brow. What was the cause of this unprecedented dread on the Savior's part? Not the mere fear of death. He who held the keys of death in his hand, and could open its doors for the return of Lazarus, or the widow's son, need not fear its power over himself. Nor was it the dread of physical suffering. He had been teaching men how to bear that, and for him no physical pain had power to turn aside a moment from the path of duty. The hours of calm and patient suffering that followed this scene, culminating with the sublime tragedy of Calvary, gave sufficient proof of Jesus' superiority to any childish weakness in view of death.

Far more than this was in that strange agony. The cross meant more to him than the martyr's reward. Else, gladly would he have welcomed it, as he has given strength to countless thousands to do, in ages since. No, death meant to him more than it could possibly mean to any other. He whose whole soul was truth incarnate, was to be crucified as a deceiver. He, the one on earth absolutely loyal to God, was to die as a blasphemer. He who knew no sin was to bear the sins of the whole world. He who could raise the dead must himself submit to death's power. It was his to disarm this last and ever-victorious enemy of man, but it was by receiving into his own breast the hated shaft. He was to deliver man from the death of the soul, which is separation from God, but it must be by himself "tasting death for every man." He could bear the hatred of his enemies and the desertion of his friends, but when his weary heart should have to cry out, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me!" it would break with its intolerable burden of grief. The 53rd chapter of Isaiah is the best commentary on Gethsemane. Upon his spotless soul the Master already felt the burden of the world's transgressions being laid; and his pure soul shrank from the ordeal. That love should be repaid by hate; purity be linked with foul sinfulness; incarnate life be subjected to loathsome death—this it was that made the prospect of the cross unbearable to the Son of Man.

As in the wilderness, thrice tempted, thrice repelling the tempter, the Master is sent an angel visitant to minister to him; so now, thrice appealing for relief, thrice submitting to the infinite will of his Father, he is heard, and heaven's ministering angel brings him comfort. "He was heard, in that he feared, and being made perfect," as a mediator, "he is become the author of eternal life unto all them that obey him." Blessed spirit of trust, how it lightens the burden and sweetens the sacrifice. "Not as I will, but as thou wilt," the heart of all true petition and devotion. "The uttermost of prayer, the uttermost of sacrifice were in the words upon which the sorrow of the race will stay itself until men shall cease to suffer, and shall no longer need to cling for courage to the heroes of pain." No wonder that from such a prayer as this the Son of God could return to his still sleeping disciples, and calmly say unto them, "Arise, let us be going; behold, he is at hand that betrayeth me." All terror was fled. Closer to the heart of infinite love had the divine sufferer been drawn, until the pain of his heart was eased, and the loving face of the Father shut from his vision the dread scene of Calvary.

TRUST.

"Trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ for Strength."

Paul was in prison when he wrote this joyful and faith-displaying letter to his beloved Philippinas. This has been called Paul's love letter. And indeed it is one of his most beautiful epistles. Untoward circumstances could not shake his faith. More or less deserted by his friends, he did not feel deserted of God. There is scarcely a more heroic figure in the world than that of the old, lonely apostle in bonds and imprisonment for his faith, but unshaken and cheerful, trusting to the cold, dark end.

Paul probably was not physically strong. There is no greater handicap to usefulness than physical weakness. Paul besought God most earnestly that this disability might be removed; but God strengthened him only by declaring, "My strength shall be sufficient for thee." And it was. Trust took the place of health; and the most herculean labors were performed by this apostle who struggled manfully with disease. Others are tried in the same way. Many are living useful lives, doing great work, who are limited in the same manner, bound about by disease.

Schliermacher, the greatest preacher perhaps that Germany has ever known, fought all his life against most painful disease. He often went into the pulpit and preached his best sermons while in excruciating agony, and when the congregation knew nothing of his condition. This was undoubtedly a display of great strength of will; but it was also a trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ. The pulpit, as Theodore Munger says, is the place where a preacher must not spare himself, it is the place where he gives himself to die on the cross.

But there are many others who are fighting in the same way against great odds. There are those who have a weakness of the will, who are tempted and sorely tried in some way; those who stand out against inner foes that they fear at any time may overwhelm them. They can find strength in Him in whom Paul found it. Let them trust in the Lord Jesus Christ for strength, and he will help in time of need.

"I know whom I have believed," said Paul, "and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day." Such is the proper attitude of a life that is hid with Christ in God.

"But," says some one, "what do you mean by trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ? How can I trust in him? That's too vague." Well, do you feel weak? Do you need a strong hand to guide? Do you want to lean on "a power not ourselves which makes for righteousness?" There is that friend, that power, that stronger one. It is Jesus whom we can know by reading of him; of whom we can feel the support by imitating him; to whom we can go as the fullest representation of God in our prayers; and whom we can seek to please—for he is alive forevermore and interested in us—in our lives. That it is, I take it, to trust in the Lord Jesus Christ.

Among our Advertisers.

Barclay Meador, Advertising Manager.

The season is well at hand for the purchase of seeds, hence seedsmen are making good use of advertising space to make known the virtues of their own respective varieties. In our columns will be found the advertisements of several different firms, notably the Storrs & Harrison Co., of Painesville, O. They have been in the business almost half a century, and enjoy an enviable reputation. They realize that it is a waste of money and of seasons too, for a planter to buy the kinds that won't grow. Their catalogue may be had for the asking.

The John A. Salzer Seed Company, of La Crosse, Wis., the great farm seed growers, also set forth the merits of their seeds in our advertising columns. They urge the trial of some splendid seed sorts to cure the hunger of the hogs and make them happy, fat, healthy and contented. In their Peaoat, a perfect food in the green state, or in their great Giant Incarnat Clover, or Sand Vetch, or Cow Peas or Rape, they have heavy cropping, quick producing foods, that tempt the appetite of the swine, or cow, or sheep, or poultry, or horse. Send five cents for their catalogue.

"Your Grandmother's Garden" is the headline of an advertisement appearing in our columns of the old established seedsmen and florists, Peter Henderson & Co., 35 & 37 Cortlandt Street, New York.

Their advertisement offers their annual superb catalogue entitled "Everything for the Garden," which is in reality a book of 190 pages, containing over seven hundred engravings and eight superb colored plates, to all who send ten cents in stamps to cover the cost of postage and mailing. In addition to the catalogue, this firm, wishing to trace the results of their advertising in different papers, will send free, to all who order catalogue and state where they saw the advertisement, a trial collection of six packets of choice vegetable and flower seeds, contained in a red envelope, which when empty and returned with an order from catalogue will be accepted as twenty-five cents in part payment.

There are but a limited number of bell foundries in the United States. The leading ones use our columns. The McShane, one of the world's greatest bell foundries, is located in Baltimore, Md. It is now somewhat more than half a century since the first McShane bell was cast. Since then this foundry has completed 10,000 single bells and hung 270 peals and 70 chimes—more than 12,000 bells in all. All McShane casts are of new ingot copper and imported block tin carefully proportioned and carefully melted to secure tonal quality and lasting quality. They are mounted very carefully and solidly for ease of ringing and neatness of design. Everything that conduces toward satisfaction is part of the McShane endeavor. The McShane Company will send catalogue free.

No class of manufacturers appreciate advertising space more than do the makers of the best pianos. The Ivers & Pond Company, of 110 Boylston Street, Boston, begin a series of advertisements in this issue. They will set forth in this series the merits of their instruments, urging the fact that Rev. F. E. Clark, president of the Society of Christian Endeavor, has one in his house, as evidence of its superior grade. They also make known their system of convenient payment, which places their instruments within easy reach. They, too, send catalogue on request.

Attention is called to the advertisement of the Natural Body Brace Co., Box 237, Salina, Kan., found in another column. These manufacturers submit testimony from skilled physicians and thousands of wearers that their brace is the best. Their book of plain, common sense reasoning, which is fully illustrated, is sent free to all who ask for it. They refund the purchase price to any who are not pleased with the brace after 30 days' trial. The high standing of the company and its management are abundantly vouched for. They offer a rare opportunity to sufferers who have found other things of no use, as well as to those who have lighter afflictions.

DAY.

Frank Deloss Day, son of Mr. and Mrs. D. R. Day, passed away at his parents' home, in Shenandoah, Ia., Jan. 19, 1901, aged 21 years, 5 months and 23 days. Frank was born in Warren county, Ill., and lived there until the removal of his father to Colorado. Three years later, when Frank was 11 years old, they came to Shenandoah, and this has been his home ever since. At the age of 12 he was baptized by Bro. Fred Hagin, now missionary to Japan. Frank was an active, energetic young man until two years ago, when his health began to fail. He was highly esteemed and a large company filled the church at the funeral service which was conducted by his pastor, J. H. Wright, assisted by his former pastor, Edgar Price, of Red Oak, Ia.

LEVERINGTON.

Mrs. Lulu Lowe Leverington, wife of James Leverington, passed into the heavenly life Nov. 9, 1900, at Hannibal, Mo., aged 23 years. She was a faithful Christian having grown up in the atmosphere of a religious home. Her beautiful Christian life was a great help to others in seeing the way of duty more clearly. How uncertain is our hold on this earth life. Just established in her own home, where she had planned for comfort and continued joy, she is suddenly called away. She leaves bereaved husband and little babe, to whom the grandmother will be a mother. May this dispensation be the means of giving to those who were nearest to her the disposition to cultivate more of the upward look and the laying up of heavenly treasure.

LEVI MARSHALL.

LOWE.

Mary Elizabeth Lowe died at the home of her mother, Hannibal, Mo., Jan. 31, 1901, aged 20 years and 11 months. She was beautiful in person and character, was full of hope, and had chosen her life companion, who was near and kind to the last. Her health gradually gave way—a victim to consumption. She was a faithful member of the church and read her Bible daily until the end. She gave a lesson of patience and trust to those about her. Her multitude of young friends besides the family feel a keen loss, but they know she was ready and the future becomes more attractive. This is the fifth death in this smitten family in six years. We shall know the meaning of these things hereafter.

LEVI MARSHALL.

TAYLOR.

Christiana Durfee was born in Madison county, N. Y., Aug. 3, 1820. Dec. 28, 1844, she was married to Dr. Geo. W. Taylor. They came west in 1853 and settled in Princeton, Ill. Sister Taylor was a woman of unusual intelligence, sagacity and wisdom. She was a life member of the C. W. B. M., a liberal giver to all our missionary enterprises, as well as to our educational work in Eureka College. She was full of Christian hospitality. Her Christian morals were on a high plain. With no children of her own, she raised three, to whom she was most faithful and devoted. After more than a year's sickness and great suffering she fell asleep in Christ, Jan. 23, 1901, full of faith and hope. Her husband, now feeble by the weight of 84 years, mourns deeply the loss of a true, loving companion during 56 years. He has the warm sympathy of the church and many friends.

WATKINS.

On Tuesday, Jan 8, Mrs. Eliza U. Watkins, full of years and satisfied with her allotted portion of love and service, with children and grandchildren by her side, closed her eyes to the scenes of this world. The end came at the family home on Riverside Drive, New York City, the funeral services being conducted by J. M. Philputt of the Lenox Avenue Christian Church. The body was interred in Mt. Vernon, Ohio. Hers was a remarkable personality. She became a Christian when but a child of ten. Her serene, triumphant faith, her uniformly calm, dignified bearing, gave her a poise and individuality, an atmosphere of her own, that impressed all with whom she came in contact. Of her life the words of Solomon are literally true: "Strength and honor are her clothing and she shall rejoice in time to come. Give her of the fruit of her hands and let her own works praise her in the gates."

Of heaven or hell I have no power to sing;
I cannot ease the burden of your fears,
Or make quick-coming death a little thing,
Or bring again the pleasure of past years.
Nor for my words shall ye forget your tears,
Or hope again for aught that I can say,
The idle singer of an empty day.

But rather, when aweary of your mirth,
From full hearts still unsatisfied ye sigh,
And, feeling kindly unto all the earth,
Grudge every minute as it passes by,
Made thee more mindful that the sweet days die—
Remember me a little then, I pray,
The idle singer of an empty day.

Then let the others go! and if indeed
In some old garden thou and I have wrought,
And made fresh flowers spring up from hoarded seed,
And fragrance of old days and deeds have brought Back to folk weary—all was not for naught.
No little part it was for me to play—
The idle singer of an empty day.

—First and last stanzas of "The Earthly Paradise," by William Morris.

WHAT WE STAND FOR

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

Current Events.

World's Fair Bill Passed. On Monday morning of this week the bill authorizing the appropriation of $5,000,000 for the World's Fair to be held in St. Louis in 1903, passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 191 to 41. The bill was taken up under a suspension of the rules, a method which shuts off amendment but requires a two-thirds vote. The measure as adopted appropriates $5,000,000 from the national treasury, but this sum is not to be used until the World's Fair Company has expended the $10,000,000 which has been raised by popular subscription in St. Louis and by act of the city council. It provides further for the establishment of a World's Fair Commission and requires that the fair shall open not later than May 1, 1903, and shall close not later than Dec. 1 of that year. There was a sharp debate before the passage of the bill, but its overwhelming victory by a vote of nearly five to one gives hope that it will have an easy passage in the Senate where it may be brought up on Thursday.

The Week in Congress. The work of Congress in these closing weeks of its session presents a combination of scramble, bustle and filibuster. Protracted debates have taken the time of Congress and now important revenue bills must be passed in haste at the risk of necessitating an extra session. The delay of the Senate in confirming Gen. Woods' appointment as major-general is said to have displeased the President more than such matters usually do, but the confirmation has now been made. The work of the conference committe on the revenue reduction bill has resulted in what seems to be a deadlock. The ship subsidy bill can scarcely be expected to come to a vote at this session in the Senate, as its opponents are using against it the senatorial prerogative of endless debate. The river and harbor appropriation bill is having an unusually hard time and may be carried over to the possible extra session. The army appropriation bill has been passed by the House. It is being pointed out that by this bill our army costs us $2,828 per soldier, which is more than ten times that of the French and German armies. This average includes the amount spent on pensions, which is more than half of the whole amount. The House has begun the consideration of the sundry civil bill.

In St. Louis. Excise Commissioner Seibert has begun the promised examination of those saloons against which complaints were entered on the ground of having wine-room attachments and the proprietors of these places will be called upon to show cause why their licenses shall not be revoked. The investigation has not yet developed any testimony sufficient to convict, but the inquiry is apparently being made in good faith and results are expected. The Committee of Public Safety, composed of fifty prominent citizens of known integrity, appointed as the result of a movement in the Ministerial Alliance, has organized and is ready for work. Its duty will be to investigate the records and characters of all candidates for city offices and make a public report of the same which can be relied upon as thoroughly non-partisan. It has been decided that the Republican nominations for the coming election on April 2, shall be made by a direct vote at the primaries, instead of at a party convention composed of delegates elected at the primaries. In spite of the danger from ballot-stuffers and repeaters at the primaries, the method of direct primaries has the advantage of forestalling the trickeries which usually play a prominent part in determining the result of a nominating convention.

McKinley Elected. During the past three months presidential campaign excitement has subsided and the popular anxiety to know who would be our next President has been satisfied by newspaper reports. The official declaration, however, was not made until Wednesday of last week when the electoral votes were counted in a joint session of the Senate and House of Representatives. The roll of the states was called alphabetically and the chosen representative of each responded with the number of its electoral votes and the name of its favored candidate. The result, 292 for McKinley and Roosevelt to 155 for Bryan and Stevenson, was announced with as much unction and enthusiasm as if the public had really been waiting for the news.

The Opening of Parliament. The formal opening of the first Parliament of the new reign was the most gorgeous state function which England has witnessed in a generation. The King's progress from Buckingham Palace to the House of Parliament in the old gilt state coach and his appearance in the House of Lords exhibited a degree of pomp and pageantry comparable in a small way to the Field of the Cloth of Gold. An eye-witness reports that the gilt coach is "neither comical nor circus-like," but if it resembles the half-dozen such at Versailles or the two score of historic imperial carriages at St. Petersburg it must be a little of both. At any rate this exhibition of royal pomp has a medieval flavor which seems strangely inconsistent with the oft-repeated statement that in Edward the world sees for the first time a strictly modern man on a throne. The King took the oath before the House of Lords and such of the Commons as could crowd into the room and read his first speech from the throne. The speech holds out no prospect of a change of policy in South Africa. The colonists are complimented on their loyalty and a brief outline is given of the measures to be introduced at this session of Parliament. According to long established custom, the crown lands and hereditary revenues of the crown are to be surrendered in exchange for a definite appropriation, called the civil list, for the expenses of the royal household. A feature of the new Parliament is the harmony which prevails among the Irish members. They are for once united to oppose every war measure and push the reforms which they desire in the Irish administration. Their eighty members, it is said, will interfere with every measure that is proposed and will obstruct and filibuster until they are bought off with the desired concessions.

Trouble in Spain. On the same day with the opening of the British Parliament, occurred an important event in the Spanish royal family which offered large opportunities for display but lacked the element of popular approval. The marriage of Princess Maria of the Asturias, an important member of the house of Hapsburg, to Prince Charles of Bourbon, was celebrated with much pomp in Madrid. The public made it the occasion of a disorderly outburst, expressing its disapproval not only of the match but of several other items in the existing order of things, and "the man in the street" is a more restless and disorderly character in Spain when he wishes to express disapproval than he is in those countries where he really has a hand in the government. The students, true to their traditions, took a lively part in the fray and directed their energies especially against the clergy. It became necessary to declare martial law and General Weyler was put in command to keep the peace, which he did by the reverse of his famous reconcentrado policy—by preventing the people from concentrating into mobs or bands. It is said that a cabinet crisis is threatened.

The Kansas Crusade. The immediate effect of the mass meeting held in Topeka on Sunday, Feb. 10, and its threat against the joints of that city seems to have been the closing of all the more conspicuous saloons without waiting until Friday, the last day of grace. Mrs. Nation meanwhile has continued her trip through Iowa, has visited Chicago and has returned to Topeka to conduct another series of hatchet battles. Last Sunday was a particularly busy day. Before daybreak a crowd collected and not only smashed some of the saloons which were closed, but broke into a storage establishment and destroyed fixtures which had been placed there, presumably for safe-keeping until the storm had gone by. Mrs. Nation was arrested. On Monday she refused to give a $2,000 bond to keep the peace, and is consequently in jail awaiting trial which is scheduled for Thursday. It has been agreed between the attorneys that the saloon-keeper upon whose complaint the trial is to be based shall admit keeping a saloon and that Mrs. Nation shall admit smashing it, so that the trial may be expected to show whether it is illegal for a private citizen to attack with violence an illegal establishment—or at least to show whether the court dares to declare that it is so. Whatever the decision may be, the character of the Kansas courts, as indicated by their attitude toward the saloons during all these years, will detract from the weight of their opinion in this case.

Resumption of War in China. Count von Waldersee is tired of being a commander-in-chief with nothing to command and it is dawning upon him—the whole world knew it long ago—that the position of field-marshal with no martial field in which to operate is an empty honor. The first expedition to Pao Ting Fu was, according to the best accounts that we can get at this distance, nothing more than an attempt to give the German commander-in-chief something brilliant to do. And now that the glory of that overrated episode has departed, he is planning another and more extensive expedition which will occupy several months. Gen. Chaffee has been invited to mobilize the American troops to participate in the expedition, but has referred the matter to Washington for decision. An official answer has not yet been sent, but it will doubtless be an order to remain in Pekin. For several months the American forces have been kept in Pekin as a legation guard while some of the other foreign troops were roving over the country, ostensibly keeping order and really gathering in loot. The military expedition projected by the commander-in-chief will probably lead to a crisis in Chinese affairs, unless the government speedily concedes everything which the ministers of the powers demand and so puts an end to every pretext for military operations. The Chinese government has on the whole been aggravatingly slow in coming to terms in the peace negotiations. There is every probability that the ministers will insist upon the death penalty for nine of the twelve condemned princes, as stated in our last issue. The Emperor is said to have suggested to the princes that they help him out of the difficult and embarrassing situation by committing suicide, but their loyalty was not equal to the test and they preferred to take their chances of a permanent disagreement between their government and the powers.

A Tax on Franchises. Two franchise tax bills have been introduced in the Missouri Legislature and the feeling on the subject is such that one of them or a compromise between them is pretty sure of passage. Gov. Dockery sent a message to the General Assembly a few days ago urging the passage of such a bill and discussing the principles which it ought to embody. A franchise as such, conferring merely the privilege "to be a corporation," should not be taxed because it has no real value above the mere fees for reincorporation. But a franchise which confers upon a corporation special privileges or the right to perform public functions, should be taxed according to the value of the privileges granted. In this class belong "corporations possessing the privilege of using the public streets, exercising the right of eminent domain, acting as common carriers, receiving and collecting tolls." Corporations naturally divide themselves into two distinct classes according as they do or do not enjoy some such special privilege and to tax one without taxing the other cannot be called unjust discrimination. The fact is that the privilege of using the public streets for a street railway track is just as much property as are the rails and ties. It is part of the plant and should be taxed as such. Of the bills now before the General Assembly, the House bill specifies in detail the classes of franchises which are to be taxed, while the Senate bill imposes a tax on all corporate franchises. The suggestion in the governor's message may be made the basis for a bill more satisfactory than either of these.

Education in the South. The recent annual meeting of the Armstrong Association of New York, which has for its object the advancement of education of both whites and blacks in the South, and is particularly interested in Hampton Institute, which is open to both races, was a notable event. The subject of education in the South was discussed by the presidents of the North Carolina State Normal School, Tuskegee Institute, the Industrial School for Whites at Camp Hills, Ala., Hampton Institute and Johns Hopkins University. Dr. Lyman Ward said that, great as is the need of education among the Southern negroes, the need of the poor whites is greater, and he urged that industrial training, which has proven so successful for negroes at Tuskegee and elsewhere, should be furnished for the whites. Dr. McIvor, speaking of the fact that the South has until recently had but little capital and its population has been scattered for the most part over great rural districts, said: "But we are getting out of the woods in the South. Recently we had a strike in my town. The reason we have not had strikes before is because we did not have any capital to strike against. I am glad in a way to see the strike. It means industrial development." He said that negro women were better cared for than white women now in the matter of education and placed the blame for this state of affairs on the preachers, politicians and state and federal governments. Booker T. Washington spoke truly of Lincoln as the emancipator of both the white and the black races, and said that slavery had injured the white man in the South almost as much as the negro. All t his emphasizes the fact that there is a tremendous educational work to be done in the South and that an intelligent zeal for that work is finding expression in the organization of educational institutions especially fitted to the work which is to be done.

Brevities. Kaiser William's recent exhibition of friendliness toward England in connection with the death of the Queen has been much criticized in Germany.

The Missouri Supreme Court upholds the constitutionality of the law requiring vestibules on electric cars in winter for the protection of the motormen.

Maurice Thompson, author of "Alice of Old Vincennes" and for many years a contributor to the Atlantic Monthly, died on Feb. 15, at Crawfordsville, Ind.

The Jeffries-Ruhlin prize-fight, which was to have been held in Cincinnati last Friday, is indefinitely postponed on account of the firm attitude maintained by Gov. Nash for the enforcement of the law.

The medical practice bill, opposed by the Christian Scientists, has been passed by the Missouri legislature after a debate in which many severe things, true but not wholly relevant, were said about that sect.

President Diaz, who had been given leave of absence from Mexico for eight months and was intending to make a visit to Europe, is seriously ill in the City of Mexico and the European tour is abandoned for the present.

The young Duke of Westminster, who acceded to his title and estate on the death of his father a year ago, and who is said to be the richest peer in England, was married last week to Miss Cornwallis-West, a sister of Lieutenant Cornwallis-West who married Lady Randolph Churchill.

It has been decided by the Secretary of the Treasury that, since Russia indirectly pays a bounty on the export of sugar, additional duties must be assessed on Russian sugar imported into this country. This ruling has awakened considerable resentment in Russia and it is probable that some measures of retaliation will be taken against American imports into Russia.

Tesla's promise to have his apparatus for trans-Atlantic wireless telegraphy in working order in eight months is paralleled by Marconi's accomplishment in telegraphing without wires from the Isle of Wight to the Lizard Head, a distance of 200 miles. Tesla's plan is to use the stratum of rarified air five or six miles above the earth's surface as a conductor. Captive balloons may be used as terminals.

What is known as the Lodge-Gillett New Hebrides Bill, to protect uncivilized Pacific islanders from civilized liquor and firearms, has been approved by the State Department and by the proper committees of the Senate and the House. All friends of temperance should help to secure the passage of this bill. If it fails, indifference will be more to blame than opposition. Write or telegraph your congressman and senators about it.

One encouraging feature of the growth of American foreign trade is that the increase is greatest in those parts of the world in which the great commercial nations are battling for supremacy. During the past ten years our exports to Europe have increased 63 per cent., but in that same decade our exports to Asia, Africa and Oceania have increased nearly 300 per cent. and our increase in these newer fields has been far greater than the increase in their total amount of trade with all nations.

The Needs of the Century.

The editor of an English magazine sent out to a number of the most eminent men in Great Britain the question, "What in your judgment is the greatest need of the 20th century?" They were requested to answer in a single sentence. The result is a remarkable symposium of contemporaneous opinion from high sources on the great question, only second in importance, if not equivalent in meaning, to that other great human inquiry: "What must I do to be saved?"

The editor of "Punch" answers, "Money." "Punch" is the English "Puck" or "Judge" and is supposed to be facetious and funny, if anything. But, coming from a humorous source, the answer that the world's great need is money is more tragic than comic. There are at least five millions of his Imperial Majesty's subjects in the British Isles who have not a farthing they do not beg or steal, and as many more whose largest cash denomination seldom exceeds the copper coin of the realm, and other millions who have the bare necessaries and none of the luxuries of life. And there is his great Indian Empire with its teeming population of two hundred and eighty millions, not half of whom perhaps ever had enough to eat in their lives, because they have not the wherewithal to buy it. And when it comes down to the bed rock of truth and reality the "deuced question of pence" with nearly all of the rest of us is the most perplexing problem of existence and makes us long for the ideal of Oliver Wendell Homes: "I would like to have just a little more than I could spend." Yes, money is a fundamental need of the world in all its centuries, so far.

Archdeacon Farrar writes his answer in a single word, characteristic of him: "Righteousness." This regnant term of Bible religion undoubtedly covers the ground, if once the practical significance could be realized among men. If men generally could be made practically to understand the eternal and transcendently important distinction between right and wrong, and the vital necessity of securing and maintaining right relations between God and man and between man and man, the most serious problem in life would have reached the final stage of its solution. We need individual and domestic righteousness, civic and municipal righteousness, commercial and political righteousness, and last, but not least, ecclesiastical righteousness, right doing in the church and through the church everywhere.

"A sense of duty instead of a love of pleasure among young men" is another answer sufficiently suggestive to be recorded here. It is to be feared that the dominating conception of our relation to material things, in the present day, is to enter at once into the enjoyment of them. Mammonism, to get money, and hedonism, to spend it in the pursuit of pleasure, is the American ideal with the vast majority of its young men. The idea of consecration and subordination of the material to the higher duties, more serious responsibilities and nobler ideals of existence, is not as thoroughly grounded in the consciousness of youth as it should be after nearly two thousand years of the Christian religion. But young men should return to the first principles of manhood and learn to make duty supreme and pleasure subordinate.

Max O'Rell, the noted Frenchman, answers: "A press upright and noble, preaching concord." What about the cheap and nasty press known as "Yellow Journalism," upwrong and preaching discord? Max ought to know that there is a press upright and noble, preaching concord, but the trouble is the people do not read it. The partisan political press, selfish, unfair, corrupt, purchasable, vituperative and scurrilous, is a prime curse of civilization that the 20th century is not likely to see the last of. The trouble is with the people who get the kind of press they desire and deserve.

A notable answer, from the standpoint of a preacher, is given by the eloquent radical of the English Establishment, since deceased, the Rev. H. R. Haweis. "More prophets, fewer parrots." Just so. A prophet is a messenger from God who is not afraid to speak the truth. A parrot is a messenger from the theological seminary who speaks what he has learned by rote. The message surges red-hot from God through the mind of the prophet direct to the hearts of the people; it is pecked and billed and scratched around by the parrot till, a third and fourth hand cinder, dead, it is offered to the people with all the fire gone out of it. Truth in the mouth of the prophet, it is cant in the bill of the ecclesiastical Poll. The man who simply repeats what he has learned, however dogmatically and fiercely, without passing it through the living furnace of his own mind and heart, and demonstrating its truth in his own experience, is a theological parrot, and not a prophet of God. Yes, a great need of the century is more prophets and fewer parrots in the pulpit.

The briefest and most pregnant and pertinent and comprehensive answer of all was that of Keir Hardie, Socialist leader and member of Parliament. In the opinion of Mr. Hardie, the greatest need of the 20th century is "Men." This covers the ground completely. One cannot help thinking of old Diogenes with his lamp in broad open daylight, looking for a man on the streets of Athens. We have often wondered if the philosopher found his man. It would be interesting to know. If he was lost in classic Greece he has scarcely been found in commercial America. Yes, if we had men to mould and govern this newest born of the centuries—yes MEN, not things, not creatures, not cousins to apes and tigers, not forked radishes with carved heads, not two-legged animals without feathers, not brutes that wear clothes, cook their food, sing and chatter, not gum-chewers and beer-guzzlers, but men—if we had these, then money and righteousness, and a sense of duty instead of a love of pleasure, a press upright and noble, preaching concord, more prophets and fewer parrots, and every other blessing of high religion and civilization would be ours.

There are three other answers that may be set down without comment as indicating fundamental needs of the century: "A revival of the sense of reverence," F. B. Meyer. "A genuine ethical revival," Silas K. Hocking. "Strenuous self-denial for the sake of higher aims in life," Alfred Rowland. Each of these answers in the symposium would make a good text for a sermon, and all of them subjects for a series of sermons on the Needs of the New Century.

"A crippled arm; hence brevity" is the excuse which a writer in another paper gives for the shortness of his articles. We wish no one any harm and would be grieved if any of our correspondents should break an arm, but—oh well, you see the point. The article referred to was probably better than it would have been if the arm had not been crippled.

Writing of the present problem of reforming the city government of St. Louis, the Central Baptist puts the whole thing in a nutshell by saying "the politics of a foot-pad is of no concern to his victim." It has never been better stated. Municipal government as we have it is a hold-up game on a large scale and it is a matter of small concern whether the official foot-pads are anti-imperialists, gold-bugs or single-taxers. What we are looking for now is honesty.

The Chinese minister, Wu Ting Fang, is to deliver the address at the next convocation of the University of Chicago. A few months ago when popular indignation against the atrocities of the Boxers ran high, an enlightened and civilized Chinaman might have been expected to blush for his countrymen as he stood before an audience of those whose fellow-countrymen had been the victims. Now as one recalls the useless murders and robberies of which the allied powers have been guilty in their alleged attempt to restore peace, one is inclined to think that the blushes might as well be mutual.

A Presbyterian journal has an editorial on "The Use of Creeds," in which it is urged that they are a wholesome and necessary thing and that a church must know what it believes—all of which is very true. But who says anything against creeds and who denies that a church ought to know what it believes? A creed is a very good thing but it must be the right kind and in the right place. Peter's creed, which was not revealed to him by flesh and blood, suits us very well and it lets the world know what we believe. A good deal of the objection to creeds in the present day is objection to creeds containing articles which the church does not believe.

Our joy in noting Prof. McGarvey's recovery, after a few weeks of illness, and the resumption of his Department of Biblical Criticism, is marred by observing a wholly gratuitous fling which he feels called upon to make at the Disciples' Divinity House. An account of some heretical utterances of two professors in the University of Chicago—an account based professedly on nothing more than a daily newspaper report—is prefaced by a remark that "it is well known that the University of Chicago is set for the propagation of destructive criticism and that the Disciples' Divinity House has the same purpose in view." It may be granted that the utterances quoted from two of the University professors are very loose and destructive and deserve criticism, though one would like to see it based on something more authoritative than a report in the daily press; and the statement of the relation of the University to destructive criticism may be passed as a subject in regard to which something can be said on both sides; but the reference to the Disciples' Divinity House is both gratuitous and misleading. To state seriously that the purpose of the Divinity House is the propagation of destructive criticism is to exhibit either ignorance of it or malice toward it.

Hour of Prayer.

The Church's Marching Orders.*

(Foreign Missionary Service.)

TEXT: And he said unto them, Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to the whole creation.—Mark 16:15.

This is one version of the last and only command of our Lord, given to His disciples after His resurrection. His work is finished; He is about to leave them to return to His Father. They are to carry on His work. Through them His kingdom is to be established. After the comparatively short time they have spent in His company, learning His will and imbibing His spirit, they are to go forth and proclaim the everlasting gospel.

The Conditions.

Last words are always impressive. How much more the last words of the Savior of the world. The community was still stirred to its depths with the excitement attending the crucifixion of Jesus and His resurrection. But, as we learn in another place (Luke 24:47), the disciples are to begin the preaching of His gospel in Jerusalem. Though outlawed and discredited, Christ had triumphed and those who had been His betrayers and murderers first heard of forgiveness through faith in Him. Yet does it not seem strange? The few faithful souls that rallied again around their Master, without a church back of them, without a missionary society organized or even thought of, without great wealth or learning, with absolutely none of the equipment men deem necessary to the success of great undertakings, are commanded to preach the gospel to the whole creation! Yet such is ever the splendid audacity of faith.

The Jewish nation had not recognized its Messiah. "He came unto His own and His own received Him not." Now if they had finally acknowledged Him and the entire nation had come over to His standard, the conditions would have been quite favorable for the evangelization of the world. But how could they go to other nations with the story of the Christ when He was despised and rejected at home? Dare they begin in Jerusalem? The authorities had compassed the death of the Master, would they not kill the disciples also? Yes, they did kill Stephen; they shut up Peter; they tried to intimidate those first preachers. Yet when the time came, those disciples obeyed their Master.

The Command.

As indicated by the title, "Marching Orders," the first part of this command was, "Go!" They were not to stand, or sit or recline. They were bidden, and through them disciples to the end of time are bidden, to go! Have we reversed the commission? Are we, as we build our comfortable churches and open the doors, saying to the world, "Come ye now and be made disciples of"? Imagine a farmer, climbing up on a stump in his field with a bag of seed and saying to his broad acres, "Come ye now, and be sown!" There are few churches indeed that do not need to study anew and heed this command in their own local work. There is all too little going "from house to house," and from man to man.

But where must they go? "Into all the world." Study the means of travel of those days, and think what an almost insuperable task this was. They would take their lives in their hands. But God's love is world-wide and His sovereign mercy is for all men. All the world must hear the gospel. In languorous tropic wilds and amid frozen wastes, to the aristocracy of learning and to the victims of ignorance and superstition, the message must be borne. "All nations," "every creature"—these are the phrases, and there is no possibility of misunderstanding language so plain.

This command is of binding authority upon the Church. It begins to be obligatory the moment you become a disciple. You must go to your own family, to your neighbors and your friends and to the stranger within your gates, telling of the love of God through Christ Jesus the Lord. And if you cannot go in person to the regions round about, then you are to assist others who can go. Disciples of Christ have made much of the illuminating commands of Christ to repent, and be baptized; but the command to go into all the world is co-ordinate with these, and to disregard it is to disobey Him whom we call Master and Lord.

The March.

It seemed for a time as if the first disciples forgot that they were to "go." They began at Jerusalem and tarried there until persecution arose, and they were all scattered abroad except the apostles. Then they remembered and "went everywhere, preaching the word." The first preachers conquered ignorance and indifference and prejudice within the church, and traveled up and down the habitable earth preaching Christ. Theirs was a heroic march. They suffered such hardships as only good soldiers know, faced perils by land and by sea, "fought with beasts," were betrayed by false brethren, but none of these things moved them. The world's history contains no brighter page than that which records the triumphant march of the first disciples in obedience to the Captain of our salvation. Are we indeed restoring the Christianity of Christ and the apostles? In this particular feature, we must confess that our Moravian brethren do far more than we.

Prayer.

We dare not go abroad, O God, until first we come to Thee. We thank Thee from the depths of our hearts that we have heard the gospel. It has cleared our sky; it has dried our tears; it has cleansed our lives. But, O God, forbid that we should hold down the truth in unrighteousness; that we should give our lips to dumbness. Again may we hear the inspiring, enabling command, to go into all the world. Help us to bear the message to others and to support loyally our representatives abroad and at home, until "all shall know thee." For Christ's sake. Amen.

*Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, Feb. 27.

Editor's Easy Chair.

Whereabouts: In a quiet, sleepy, dreamy village scattered along the shore line of a bay, and half hidden under the shelter of patriarchal live-oaks and magnolias, draped with moss; whose front is seamed or gashed by deep gulches down which gleam and sparkle clear streams of pure water from springs in the hills as they flow into the bay; and whose sole street is a romantic winding foot-path along the water-front, marked by rustic bridges that span these gulches, and connect the dwellings with each other and with the post office and boat-landing. Such is the village whose classic name is that of the celebrated grove in Antioch on the Orontes, made famous in "Ben Hur." Across the bay ten miles distant in a straight line is a city of commerce, with a fine harbor first settled by the French in the year 1711, and named after one of the aboriginal tribes of Indians that were there before the French. Both the city, and the village beyond the bay, are in the state whose name was given to a vessel of war fitted out in foreign waters for assisting the Confederacy during the Civil War, and which subsequently became the subject of international complications of a grave character which were ultimately settled by arbitration. Such is the editor's present address. We shall be pleased to hear from such of our friends as will require no answer.

There is a sort of aristocracy among trees, just as there is among people. The great, majestic live-oaks, which form a noble cluster in front of the house in which we are finding more than shelter and food, belong to the "First Families" of this region. Indeed it is not unlikely that they have royal blood in their veins. One of the group measures a little more than nineteen feet around its girth, and the others are scarcely inferior. But it is not size simply, there is a certain lordliness in the way they lift themselves in the air and stretch out their sinewy arms over a wide area over which they seem to claim sole dominion. This air of royalty is aided by the long gray moss, which hangs in graceful festoons from its limbs. Sitting on the front porch of the Randall mansion one can look out beneath these great monarchs of the forest at the waters of the bay glinting in the light of the setting sun, as they are doing now as we write these lines. Up the bay, a little ways, is a mammoth live-oak venerable with age and surrounded with a halo of historic renown. Under its wide-spreading branches General Jackson once reviewed his troops, in one of his Indian campaigns, and tradition says he held a conference under this same tree with some Indian chiefs, resulting in a treaty of peace. The tree is in every way worthy of the tradition, not being unlike "Old Hickory" in its rugged strength and picturesque effect in the landscape. General Jackson was gathered to his fathers long ago, but the stalwart oak remains, offering shelter to man and beast and birds. Such is the brevity of human life compared with these patriarchs of the forest.

It is a great preventive of loneliness, and of homesickness, in entering a strange place to find at least a few persons who, if you do not know them personally, are known by reputation to you, and you to them. There are many people you know in common, and there is at once a bond of sympathy between you and them and a common basis for intercourse and friendship. Among those whom we have found in this village-by-the-bay, either as winter or all-the-year-round residents, are W. D. and B. L. Randall, father and son, with their families, who are here from Cleveland, O. They have charming homes here, side by side, under the great live-oaks described above. With the younger Randall we are finding a delightful resting-place for the present. Our next door neighbor on the north is Col. Horde and wife, of Mexico, Mo., who own and live in a romantic home perched on a knoll overlooking the bay, almost surrounded by gulches, and nearly concealed by the riot of semi-tropical vegetation which is permitted to remain, largely, in its primitive state. One would hardly expect such romance in people who rejoice in the luxury of grandchildren, but some people have learned the art of preserving their youthful tastes and loves, in spite of the flight of years. Mr. and Mrs. Shoutz, son-in-law and daughter of General Drake, have a beautiful home here which is at present undergoing repairs and the family has not yet arrived. So we are not without some tangible connection with that larger world that lies outside of this quiet village, slumbering under the moss-laden live-oaks, pines and magnolias, on the banks of the bay.

The fitness of this village as a place in which to rest may be judged by the absence of some things which are boasted of by many towns which cannot compete with it as a resort for those seeking mental repose. There is no railroad, hence no shrieking of locomotives at all hours of the night, and no rumbling of trains, and no long train of freight cars to shut off some beautiful landscape or waterscape. There is no telegraph, and hence no telegrams to rack one's nerves with apprehensions of sudden calamities. There is not even a telephone, a luxury in which many towns excel the cities. A small steamer making daily trips across the bay and return is the only method of communication with the rest of the world. There is no doctor in town, and no drug store; hence the longevity of its citizens! This is no slight on first-class physicians, who do not believe in the efficacy of drugs much more than we do. The good doctor will always be a useful adjunct to civilization, to teach people how to live normal, healthy lives—how to keep well rather than how to get well. In the languorous atmosphere of this beautiful woodland village, we are learning how to do nothing and not fret about it. We are succeeding admirably.

But, men and brethren, do not, we beseech you, neglect any necessary preparation for the March offering. Others will stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance, but we must add our personal exhortation. It was never more important to stand by the foreign mission work than now. Never has it beens so much slandered by designing politicians; never has it made in modern times so glorious a chapter of martyrdom for Christ's sake. Let us stand by it with purse and prayer and pluck.

Questions and Answers.

A lady who has been a member of the German Baptist Church wishes to unite with the Christian Church, but objects to being immersed again. Should she be received upon her trine immersion and why?

One Interested.

Why not? We believe that in trine immersion there are two superfluous immersions. But these surely do not invalidate the first one. The lady has been immersed. Surely it would not improve matters to add to her three immersions a fourth.

Do only those who are immersed receive the Holy Spirit as a Guide, Helper and Inspirer? There are some good people who, having been only sprinkled, speak with the utmost assurance of the Spirit's help and whose lives show the fruits of the Spirit.

E. C. H.

Disobedience to an understood command can never win the approval of God or the help of His Spirit, but the facts of Christian history, the records of the lives of good men, show that throughout all ages God has given his blessing to the work of men who erred in many particulars in their understanding of His will.

Were the twelve apostles converted before the crucifixion of Christ? In a discussion I said they were called and appointed to preach the gospel before the crucifixion. My opponent said not until after the ascension of Christ. B. F. Jacks.

Beeman, Ida.

See Matthew 10. The twelve were, of course, called and appointed before the crucifixion, but they could not preach the gospel, as we know it, until all the facts of the gospel, including the crucifixion and resurrection, had actually transpired. Matthew states it well enough when he says that they were sent to preach that "the kingdom of heaven is at hand."

Can we conscientiously use the song, "Pass Me Not, O Gentle Savior"? Does He not stand ever the same ready Helper to all suppliants alike? H. C.

Yes, to both parts of the question. He does stand ready to help all suppliants, but that is no reason why we should not pray for help. The song is only a prayer for that help which He stands ready to give. Jesus said "your heavenly Father knoweth what ye have need of before you ask him," but he nevertheless taught us to pray.

1. Is there any reason why we should celebrate the Savior's resurrection on Easter in a different manner from that in which we celebrate it on any other first day of the week?

2. If so, in what should the difference consist?

3. Would it be right for us as a church to dispense with our Lord's day service that our members might go to the Episcopal, Catholic and other services where Easter is observed in such a manner as to make the service attractive to the eye and pleasing to the ear? Inquirer.

1. There is no law either for or against such celebration. In favor of it is the universal custom of celebrating anniversaries. Patriotism should not be confined to one or two days in the year, but it is helped by a proper observance of Feb. 22 and July 4; and the Savior's resurrection should be remembered not only on every Lord's day but on every day. But many may be impressed with it upon the anniversary of the event, when it is uppermost in the thoughts of the Christian world, who cannot be brought to think seriously of it at other times. Against it is only the fact that the observance of religious anniversaries in the Catholic Church has been carried to a superstitious excess in the innumerable Saints' Days.

2. In special service which will bring to mind the resurrection in the most impressive manner.

3. Certainly not, unless arrangements are made for a union service, which could hardly be done with a Catholic or Episcopal Church.

Is the last clause in the Lord's prayer an interpolation: "For thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen!" Matthew 6:13? Do the ancient manuscripts contain this part?

John D.

Some of the ancient manuscripts give this sentence and others omit it. It is found in the Alexandrian manuscript (in the British Museum) and in the manuscript of Ephraim Syrus, both of the fifth century; but it is omitted from the Sinaitic manuscript of the fourth century (found by Tischendorf in 1859), the Vatican manuscript of the fourth century, the Beza manuscript of the sixth century and some others. It is omitted by three of the five most ancient and important manuscripts, and the critical editions of the text by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelles, Weiss, and Westcott and Hort exhibit the opinion that the passage is an interpolation.

You speak of the possibility of a "united Protestantism." Do you despair of a union that will include Roman Catholics?

Unitas.

Yes, unless there is a very radical reformation in Roman Catholicism. The essential principles of Protestantism and Roman Catholicism are antagonistic. The former emphasizes the vital, internal and spiritual nature of Christianity, and brings the soul into direct contact with God; the latter emphasizes external organization, rites and ceremonies, and brings the church and the priesthood between the soul and God. The one makes Christ the only Master; the other interposes a hierarchy culminating in an infallible pope. The one teaches salvation by grace through faith; the other teaches salvation by submission to the authorities of the church and compliance with certain rites which it imposes. One grants spiritual freedom; the other is spiritual bondage. One looks to renovation of the heart and life; the other promises ablution on submission to its priesthood, and looks less to character than to the acknowledgment of the authority of the Church. We put no limitations on the power of God to work changes in harmony with His will; but without some revolutionary change union with those who are now under such an ecclesiastical despotism seems extremely improbable. And yet we should pray for the unity of all who are Christ's followers.

The RESULTS of MISSION WORK IN CHINA

By F. E. MEIGS, President of Nankin Christian College

To know the men and women who go to the mission field; to understand something of their purposes, hopes and ideals; to appreciate, in some measure, their zeal, their resignation, and their strong reliance upon the Almighty arm, is to be assured of their success and of the permanency of the results of their labors. The missionary army is not an army of adventurers seeking for gold or glory. They have not gone out not knowing whither they have gone nor whom they follow. They constitute a well-drilled, a thoroughly equipped host, led by a Captain who never lost a battle. But who constitute this ever victorious throng? "Among them, men and women, are scholars, thinkers, linguists, literary celebrities, physicians, surgeons, senior wranglers and college valedictorians, representing the best brain and training of western universities and the ripest grace of western christendom; all there with a common purpose, all swayed with a common aim, all submissive to one invisible head, the Captain of the Lord's host, the Lord of lords and the King of kings." Can such men and such women, prompted by such motives and under such a leadership, fail? No, a thousand times no. God the Father, whose "word shall not return unto Him void," says no; Jesus our Lord, who came to seek and save the lost, reiterates the unfailing promise of success; the Holy Spirit, the Comforter, and the Church confirm the testimony.

Let us now inquire further, what these have accomplished in China. "At first a single pioneer, Robert Morrison (1807), then two and three, then a score, then a hundred, then a thousand, and now God's army of conquest numbers 2,800 missionaries, and more to follow." They are not massed in camps, all these men and women; they are all over the empire—in the cities, in the towns, up the valleys, along the rivers, over the plains, on the mountains, on the borders of Tibet, in malarial marshes fighting epidemics, and, what is sometimes worse, the fury of devilish mobs. The weapons of this warfare are not carnal; there is no roll of the stirring drum, no confused noise of the warriors, nor garments rolled in blood; there are Bibles, there are preaching places, there are hospitals, there are sermons preached by the twenty thousand a week, there are hymns of praise, there are leaves of the tree of life flying abroad by the millions, and there is the lifting up of "holy hands without wrath and doubting."

It is not all fair weather; there are afflictions; there are distresses; there are tumults; there are watchings and fastings; fightings without and fears within. The missionaries conquer by their lives; by the word of truth; by the armor of righteousness; by honor and dishonor; by evil report and by good report. There they stand, messengers of God. They are a mere drop in the bucket, yet no class of men in human society are exerting an influence so tremendous.

"They interfere," as a Shanghai paper says, "as a buffer-state between what are considered to be the dangerous literary and official classes of China, and the dangerous and diplomatic classes of the West." "They act," as another Shanghai paper says, "as the generators of a new moral energy—the supreme need of the hour." The above quotations are from Dr. Wm. Ashmore, of Swatow, China, who has been in China since 1851, and is still engaged in active mission work. This is a part of his testimony to the character of the missionary body and the extent and success of their work, after an experience of fifty years at the front.

Some are inquiring, what of the native Christians? On this much that is encouraging might be said. When Robert Morrison died, after 34 years of self-sacrificing labor, only six natives had been baptized. As late as 1853, there were only 300 native Christians to be found in all the empire of China. In 1865 there were 4,000; in 1875, 8,000; in 1890, 60,000; in 1900, not less than 100,000. Now, while a native membership of only 100,000 in a population of 400,000,000 is a very small proportionate number, it will be seen that at the present rate of increase another century will not have passed until China will be at the Master's feet. Judging from the rapid strides of the gospel in other lands in the centuries past, and believing in the promises and power of God, we doubt not that long before the dawn of another century, China will be won for our King.

But who are these Chinese converts? Who are they among these yellow sons of the race, who have named the name of our God? Do they know Him as we know Him, and love Him as we love Him? Is the precious name of Jesus just as sweet to our brother in yellow as it is to us? Does he believe, as we believe, and trust as we trust? Does he desire that the precious news of salvation shall be told to all men, as we desire that glorious consummation? Has he beheld the same light, and does he cherish the same hope? There are many ways of testing men. Let us test our Chinese brother in the matter of his genuineness. The church in China is poor, not many rich, not many noble, have yet entered; yet they pay most liberally of their substance to the support and spread of the truth. Dr. Yates said in 1876, "the contributions average $3.50 per member." In that year, native Christians contributed $10,000 to Christian objects; in 1886, $12,847; in 1890, $37,000, and the rate of increase in contributions annually has kept pace with the increase of members.

The membership of the Christian Church in China is, according to the most recent statistics, 566. Not one of them is worth $200, while the large majority of them are very, very poor, yet last year they gave $476 to the preaching of the gospel. They give far more, in proportion to their ability to give, than is contributed by members of churches in the United States. This is the testimony of all the missions. I know of no better test of the genuineness of a man's Christianity than the test which touches his purse. The Chinese Christians stand the test.

What of their firmness when facing persecution? I wish the records of the present trouble in China were complete. Such an array of evidence would be forthcoming as would put to silence the slander-mongers who say there are no converted Chinamen, dispel the doubts of the honest doubter, and encourage the heart and strengthen the faith of them who have seen the work of the Spirit among the heathen. Thousands, yea, tens of thousands, have given up their lives for Christ, and just as willingly as ever did Huguenot or Englishman.

Our own Brother Shi, of Chu Cheo, when he and his congregation of native Christians were given the alternative of recanting or being burned in the chapel, asked the brethren whether they would go back to their idols or die with him for the testimony of Jesus. He received the unanimous response, "Let the chapel be our funeral pile." They had every reason to believe that the threat of the mob would be carried into execution. A body of one hundred girl students in Pekin were told that the building was to be burned while they were locked inside. They replied, "We do not want to die now; we wish to live longer to work for Jesus, but if we must go, won't it be glorious that we can all go to heaven together!" An old man 70 years of age, for more than 30 years a Christian, was to be nailed to a cross. He begged his persecutors to nail him with his head downward, as he thought himself unworthy even to die as his Master died. Dr. Legge, after 40 years of missionary service in China, said: "I have been by the bedside of men and women who have died in Christian peace and hope. I have heard men who had been at one time great criminals and afterward lived good lives, comforting with their latest breath, and stimulating their friends who stood weeping around. I have known not a few who took submissively the spoiling of their goods because of their faith. I know well one who had sealed his Christian profession with his blood, and died a faithful martyr. Yes, these converts are real." Rev. C. E. Turner said, "I have worked with Chinese Christians who have borne in their bodies the marks of the Lord Jesus; men with great burnt scars on their bodies, where they had endured the tortures of fire in the service of the gospel. I have trodden in the footsteps of a Chinese martyr who laid down his life for the Lord Jesus, and I looked upon the spot where they cast his corpse into the river."

Similar testimony might be recited to an almost unlimited extent, but this is sufficient. God is in the work of missions in China. He has a people there. He is calling us to their rescue. He is calling us by the command to "Go!" He is calling us by our Christian love and desire to see all men saved; He is calling us by their needs; He is calling us by the blood of the martyrs; He is saying to us, go that you may be saved, for to be saved you must save them. When I reach the fields of eternal rest I shall meet my brother in yellow who will be there because I went unto him with the words of life. Who would not have part in this glorious work? All may have.

London Mourning for a Bishop.

The English people are very proud of the "Bench of Bishops." It is unfortunate that it is so. This worship of bishops is a blinding bewitchment of souls and does more than anything else to prevent the progress of reform. Very few people in this old country know what New Testament episcopacy means, and very few will submit to be taught. So we have a set of about two dozen semi-popish prelates who by their social dignity and high status cast a deceptive glamor over the mind of the whole nation. But it must be frankly admitted that there is a bright side as well as a dark one to this system of Anglican prelacy. As long as the Episcopal Church maintains its ascendency it is desirable that its dignitaries should be men of the highest character, of real influence for good. Well, there have never been so many of the bishops worthy of esteem and respect as there are at this day. Several are amongst the finest scholars in the world. The Bishop of Durham, Dr. Brooke Foss Westcott, is one of the first authorities in the world on classics as applied to divinity. He is the successor of the beloved and learned Lightfoot. The greatest of living Anglican preachers is Dr. Boyd Carpenter, Bishop of Ripon. The most liberal of all bishops is Dr. Percival, Bishop of Hereford, who is a complete radical. The Queen's favorite amongst the prelates is Dr. Davidson, Bishop of Winchester, who also happens to be the chief socialist amongst his colleagues, and is constantly interesting himself in the welfare of the common people. The Archbishop of Canterbury, the renowned Dr. Temple, is the leader in England of all the total abstainers, and he is one of the finest Oxonian classic scholars England has ever seen. He was for years the head master of Rugby, the principal grammar school in the land. But no bishop ever conquered fame in this country so rapidly as Dr. Mandell Creighton, who was four years ago translated from the See of Peterborough to that of London. During those four years he became the most famous and popular man in London, next to the Prince of Wales and Lord Salisbury, and he certainly has been more beloved than even these. Alas, to-day, at St. Paul's Cathedral, the remains of this remarkable man are being interred. He died a few days since at his palace at Fulham, after undergoing a delicate and difficult abdominal operation. He was one of the two great ecclesiastical historians whose works have in our time superseded all others. The other writer is Dr. Stubbs, Bishop of Oxford. Bishop Creighton has written a number of magnificent books on the reformation age. One of the most delightful of these is his famous treatise on "The Popes During the Reformation." He was a splendid linguist, and when in Russia read publicly the Russian liturgy in the services in some of the cathedrals.

The Scare Among the Topers.

A dreadful fright has scared the brewers and their customers. There are many of us who might happen to die from accidental poisoning, but we could never be killed by poisoned beer, being total abstainers. But the millions of English beer drinkers are just now under a reign of terror. They cannot give up their beloved swill, and yet they are all over the land haunted by a fear of death. For hundreds of drinkers have been killed through taking beer manufactured with sugar containing arsenic. The cause of this adulteration is simple enough. Beer is like nearly everything else in these days. It is grossly and villainously adulterated. The chemist in these days tyrannizes over the table and concocts all kinds of mysteries, fearfully and wonderfully made. And the old-fashioned beer, made simply of malt and hops, is now practically unknown. The sugar used is manufactured not from the sugar cane but from a chemically arranged glucose. Into some varieties of this arsenic is mixed, and some of this has found its way into the brewing vats. Beer thus made has gone all over the country and large numbers of people have been laid low. The consternation is so great that parliamentary action is being agitated for. But, as in America, the legislature is very difficult to move. It is to be reasonably hoped that many people will begin to lose confidence in their beer, and will not so easily and scornfully oppose or despise the temperance cause. There is, however, one spurious article which does even more mischief than poisoned beer, and that is the adulterated gospel which is so almost universally popular. For I grieve to have to say that here in my country the pure and simple gospel, the ancient hallowed truth as it is in Jesus, finds no favor whatever with the mass of people calling themselves "religious." Mark, I do not say calling themselves "Christians." I am always struck, wherever I move in England, with the fact that very few people even in the most earnest churches, ever profess to be Christians. Now and then the name seems to occur, as if by accident, but it is employed in a very secondary accent. I everywhere meet with plenty of people who earnestly contend for their appellations of Baptist, Methodist, Churchman, Congregationalist, etc. For these they are ready to wrangle at an instant's notice, but I rarely encounter those who care to insist on being Christians or are anxious simply to induce others to become Christians. Most people of religious preferences like their religion adulterated. I know many who would like me and my brother Disciples all the better if we would poison our Christianity. Then they would accept it greedily. The most popular preachers of to-day are the purveyors of poisoned gospels. This is a very frank way of putting the matter, but this subject is the most momentous in the world. It lies close to my heart at all times. I and others have been popular preachers when we were sectarian, and we know only too well how much easier is success for those who consent to go on poisoning the water of life.

The New Century Sermon.

A welcome reaction seems to be setting in against the short sermon. The Church of England has done its best to kill the sermon, by whittling it down more and more, and by lengthening out the intoned service, and treating the people to concerts in the pretended "musical services." In a genial and chatty article the best of the great London dailies, the Daily News, my favorite English journal, discusses at considerable length "The New Century Sermon." I rejoice to see this striking article appear in a secular daily, because it is a religious sign of the time, and is a favorable omen. It is something to be reassured that the sermon as a religious institution has a real future, and that a very prosperous and important one. For the dreary prophets of decline in every department of life have long asserted that the sermon would soon be as extinct as the Dodo. It is perfectly true that the 19th century witnessed a revolt against the lengthy, argumentative discourse of sonorous periods and doctrinal substance. Brevity and point and freshness of presentation, with a tendency to the conversational, have long been in demand. All this will also have its day and cease to be. Inordinate length provoked its reaction, and so will excessive brevity. Meantime the people ask for brightness, pithiness and a living faith. Of one thing we preachers may rest convinced for our constant encouragement. We may be quite sure that the living voice can never be superseded by the press. So long as human nature abides unchanged in its needs and hopes, so long will its craving be for "life passed through the fire of thought." Great preachers will be produced in every generation, and they will always attract great audiences. But even smaller men, provided they live out the love of Christ and speak sincerely, will also find their word gladly received. Therefore, though long sermons may not be popular, I verily expect that they will again have their turn.

Lord Rosebery to the Front.

One thing which tries the patience of the English people is the erratic conduct of their most trusted public men. One of the ablest of these is Lord Rosebery. He has been prime minister once for a short time, and if he lives a few years longer he is almost sure to find himself in such a position again. But he has for some time taken to retiring for intervals to his tent; not exactly to sulk like Achilles in his ominous wrath, but to give himself repose during the still protracted Tory reign of the Salisburyites. There is no man whom the rank and file of the people love better to listen to than this Scotch nobleman. He is a middle-aged aristocrat, but he is popular in his sympathies, is full of the fire and freshness of youth, is highly cultured and splendidly versatile, and is gifted with the ability to pour forth strains of oratory which are equally interesting and informative. He is one of those men who are looked to both to voice public opinion and also to help to form and guide it. In a lucid speech just delivered by him to the chamber of commerce at Wolverhampton, Lord Rosebery has been discoursing on the next great war. And what sort of a war is this to be? Well, it is a relief to be assured that it will not be fought with cannon, rifles, swords and bayonets, nor by armies and navies, but will be simply a vast and strenuous trade conflict by competing nations for commercial supremacy. That is to be the rivalry of the 20th century. Wars of bloodshed are dictated by passion, but this war of industry and trade will be prompted by reason. This new century is going to be, in the opinion of Lord Rosebery, one of the acutest periods in the history of international conflict in point of trade. Is not Lord Rosebery most likely quite correct in his forecast? We English were the first nation of the modern world to discover that trade was an absolute necessity. For that we were named a "nation of shopkeepers." But now every nation wishes to go into shopkeeping. So much the better for the interests of all humanity! Our two great rivals will be America and Germany. Our fear is that the great trust evil will be forced on us. But I am one of those who believe that the colossal trusts carry in their own bosoms the seeds of their self-destruction. Some evils cure themselves at last. So will this one. Nature provides a balance of power in all directions, and the social and commercial equipoise will be maintained. The Leiter lesson will be repeated, and so will the new lesson just administered by the Salt Trust to the Armour Company and by the Armour Company to the Salt Trust. When salt is raised to such an exorbitant price in America by the trust system that the Armour Company is driven to import salt from Europe, even the simplest tyro in economics must perceive how the law of equilibrated values inexorably asserts itself.

How to Study the Epistle to the Hebrews*

By Mark Collis

1. To understand any letter, we must know to whom it is written. As its name indicates this epistle was addressed to Jews, not to the Jews as such, but to those who had accepted Jesus as the Christ. Primarily, however, it seems to have been addressed to the Jewish believers who dwelt in and about Jerusalem. This is indicated: (a) by the writer's assuming the familiarity of his readers with the rites and customs of the Jewish system; (b) by numerous allusions which can be better understood when we accept this supposition. One of the most beautiful of these is 13:12-14. What tender associations would be suggested by the thought of Jesus' passing along the way, and out through the gate that led to Calvary. They knew that way, they had often passed through that gate, and, if they were true to him, they would cheerfully suffer for him and say, "Let us therefore go forth unto him without the camp bearing his reproach."

2. The writer's object was to guard his readers against the danger of apostasy, to which they were exposed in many ways.

(a) They were subjected to cruel persecution on account of their faith. Stephen had been stoned; then there was a great persecution against the church which was at Jerusalem, and they were all scattered abroad throughout the regions of Judea and Samaria except the apostles; then James was killed and Peter was imprisoned. This is referred to (10:32, 33) in the words: "Call to remembrance the former days, in which, after you were enlightened, you endured a great conflict of sufferings; partly being made a gazing-stock both by reproaches and afflictions, and partly becoming partakers with them that were so used."

(b) As Jews, all the customs and the traditions of their fathers were dear to them. They were God's chosen people. Every day they gazed upon the temple, the pride of their nation. Daily the priests were ministering there, the incense rising, and the sacrifices being offered. All this, they were now taught, belonged to a dispensation that was passed, and the temple with all its beautiful ceremonies would soon come to an end.

(c) These people—influenced by such sentiments concerning the past, persecuted as followers of a crucified Nazarene, many of them, perhaps, with a weak faith at best—were in great danger of apostasy. It was to save them from the awful sin of rejecting Christ that this letter was written.

3. All this will throw much light upon many difficult parts of the epistles; such as 6:1-8 and 10:23-29. These passages do not teach that there is no hope for a poor disciple overcome by sin. No! No! But they do teach that there was no hope for that Jew who had accepted Jesus as his Savior, who had been enlightened, who had been made a partaker of the Holy Spirit, and then, influenced by the sophistries of unbelieving Jews or by the cruelties of their persecutions, had surrendered his faith in Christ. Why? Because, "he had crucified the Son of God afresh and had put him to an open shame," because he had trodden underfoot the Son of God, and had counted the blood of the covenant wherewith he was sanctified an unholy thing, and had done despite unto the spirit of grace!

4. We find a large number of quotations from the Old Testament in the epistle. Of these sixteen, just half of the whole number are from the Psalms. These may be easily recognized by the reader of the New Version—which we should all use—by their poetic form. It is not strange that the author should quote so largely from the Jewish hymn book, when we remember that a large number of the priests, who had been accustomed to chant these sacred lyrics about the temple, had become obedient to the faith.

5. We are now prepared to take up the book and read it. In doing so we shall be impressed with the thought that our author undertakes to prove the superiority of the Christian to the Jewish system:

(1) He shows how much the Son is better than the angels, through whom in the past God had made known his will. "Therefore we should give the more earnest heed to the things that were heard, lest haply we drift away from them." Chapters 1, 2.

(2) He points out His superiority to Moses and exhorts his readers against unfaithfulness, the sin of their forefathers. Chapter 3.

(3) He warns them of the danger of losing that rest which all may find in the Son, 4:1-13.

(4) He shows the superiority of Jesus to Aaron as a high priest, 4:14-7:28. In this discussion he points out the fact that our high priest is more venerable than the Aaronic priest because he is of the order of Melchizedek, and able to save to the uttermost them that draw near unto God through him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.

(5) He compares the two tabernacles and the two covenants, showing that that which was Jewish was fading, while the Christian is permanent; and that the former things were intended simply to foreshadow what were to come, the blessings of the Messiah's reign, 8:1; 10:18.

(6) What remains is largely hortatory.

(a) He calls upon these Jewish believers to show their faith in Jesus and to hold fast the confession of their hope, 10:19-25.

(b) He warns them of the danger of apostasy, 10:26-31.

(c) He reminds them of their former faith and urges them not to cast away their boldness, persecuted though they might be, 10:32-39.

(d) He tries to thrill their hearts with the familiar story of their ancient heroes, men of faith, and thus to make them strong in faith. Chapter 2.

(e) Then he speaks of those ancient worthies as witnesses of those who were running the Christian race, 12:1-3.

(f) He shows that afflictions are only the chastening of a loving father and should not drive us from Christ. 12:4-17.

(g) He compares Sinai with the spiritual Zion, the city of the living God, the Heavenly Jerusalem, innumerable hosts of angels, the general assembly and church of the first born who are enrolled in heaven, God the judge of all the spirits of just men made perfect, Jesus the mediator of the New Covenant, and the blood of sprinkling that speaketh better things than that of Abel, 12:18-28.

(h) He concludes (chapter 13) with many exhortations which appear most beautiful when read in the light of what precedes.

5. Who is the author of this wonderful epistle? The letter is anonymous. In my opinion the many critics who ascribe it to Paul have the best of the argument. This view gives peculiar beauty to the letter. Paul was well acquainted with Jerusalem. He remembered how he had persecuted the saints there; how he had made havoc of the church; how he had guarded the clothes of those who stoned Stephen. He remembered how hard it was for the brethren in Jerusalem to have confidence in him when he first visited them and how Barnabas had gone his surety. He remembered, too, how he had not been permitted to labor among the brethren there. For them he always had the most tender feeling and when they suffered in times of want he was careful to contribute and to encourage others to contribute to their relief. And now, far away, his heart yearned for them; he trembled at the thought of their turning away from Christ; and he sat down and wrote this wonderful letter that must have strengthened the faith of many of them, moved many to tears, and made many regret the letter was so short when they came to the closing words—"Grace be with you all, Amen."

A Prayer.

Jon Gorse.

Lift me, dear Lord, to Thy exalted height,
Whence I may, humbled, see the breadth of life:
That I may see my duty with Thy sight,
And learn the bitter littleness of strife:—
That I may know how all men yearn to be
As crystal pure and holy as Thou art,
E'en though they seem to turn from Thee,
Thy law is beauty to each heart.

New York Letter.

By S. T. Willis.

The growth of the cause of the Disciples in Greater New York has reduced the number of church organizations by one within recent months. Bro. R. W. Stevenson, of Lansingburg, was sent by the State Mission Board to the Kensington Church, Brooklyn, to hold a series of evangelistic meetings in December. After a few days' labor it was decided to unite the two small churches of Kensington and Flatbush. Accordingly a union meeting was called at Flatbush on December 11th, when 32 persons signed the articles of agreement by which the two congregations were consolidated. Since that time six have been added to the roll of the saved. Bro. John Smeltzer, formerly a Baptist minister, has united with them and is now the hard-working pastor of the church. His labors are being richly blessed and the people are united and happy under his leadership. They have a flourishing adult Bible-class under his instruction. The Bible-school, C. E. Society and Dorcas Society are among the auxiliary forces of the consolidated church. The Bible-school at Kensington continues to hold services and will do so for the present. We wish the consolidated church great success in the work of the Lord.

Among the helpful agencies of pastoral work none can be more useful than the church visitor and the local church paper. Especially can these agencies be used to a great advantage in the work of a city congregation where the demands are always heavy. The church on 169th street has recently added both of these auxiliaries to the working forces. Mrs. May Scheurer, formerly of Toledo, O., has been employed as our church visitor and is doing excellent work. We recently began the publishing of a weekly paper which we call the Church Bulletin, and which circulates in the local field. Five hundred copies are published each week and distributed all through the community. Good results have followed already. If you can arrange for the publication of a small weekly paper and make it serve the real interests of the cause, it will prove a valuable adjunct in the work. One of the excellent features of such a paper is the relief which it affords in the matter of multitudinous and multifarious pulpit notices. There is a gross impropriety in many of the announcements which a minister is called upon to make from the pulpit in the midst of devotional services. To make them is to cause a break in the services; to refuse to make them would cause a break in some tie of fellowship or friendship. It is a good plan to print those pertaining to the specific work of the church; and post on a bulletin board in the vestibule those not directly connected with the interests of the church. The "parish paper" can be used to great advantage in pushing all features of the work, social, devotional, missionary, evangelistic and such like.

The next conference of the Disciples of Christ of the middle Atlantic states will be held with the church at Plymouth, Pa., of which Bro. W. C. Harvey is pastor. The conference will convene on Tuesday evening, May 21st, and adjourn Thursday evening, the 23rd. Let all the churches of the conference territory make ready to send their respective pastors and other delegates. There are several matters about which we ought to confer in relation to the Atlantic Conference. We are planning to go to the National Congress at Lexington, Ky., March 26-28. Why not all the eastern men go together and confer on these importan matters en route? Leaving New York at 9 A. M., Monday, March 25th, on the "F. F. V.," Pennsylvania R. R., we would pass Philadelphia at 11:33, Baltimore at 1:46 P. M., Washington, 3:00, Gordonsville, 5:33, and Charlottesville at 6:15. This would put us in Lexington at 7:12 Tuesday morning. Will not the eastern preachers arrange to go as per this announcement so we may be together in conference on the interests of evangelizing the east? I know of no other time when we could get together, before the conference convenes. If any preacher or other person has a suggestion to offer on any feature of the program, we should be pleased to hear from him.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

When your pastor said that the Roman Catholic Church is dying out he was in error. The Roman Catholic Church in the United States is not dying out. The latest available statistics show that there are 11,636 ministers in the Catholic Church, 12,062 churches and about 8,610,226 members. From 1890 to 1900 there was an increase of 2,470 priests, 1,817 churches and 2,367,959 members. The annual increase in the membership of the Roman Catholic Church in the United States during the last decade was about 236,000. A church having such an increase is not a dead or a dying church.

That the Roman Catholic Church suffers an enormous loss cannot be denied, Romanists themselves confess it. The following taken from a recent issue of the Denver Catholic, is to the point:

"In 1790 there were only 30,000 Catholics in the United States. These were cared for by about forty priests. Now we have a cardinal, an apostolic delegate, ninety-one archbishops and bishops, 11,636 priests and nearly fifteen millions of a Catholic population. Then we were in the proportion of one to 106 of the white population; now we are in the relation of about one to five of the entire population of the country. It is sad to think, however, that our losses have been very great. If we had been able to preserve the faith in all immigrants and their descendants, we would number close upon one-half the population of the United States. We are, thank God, at present in position to stop this leakage, and to number our converts at the rate of 30,000 a year."

Here is a confession of enormous losses. Such confessions on the part of Roman Catholic writers and speakers are not unusual. The claim that the Catholics "number" their "converts at the rate of 30,000 a year," is a confession of weakness. With 8,610,226 members, or "nearly fifteen millions of Catholic population," ministered to by 11,363 priests, "converts at the rate of 30,000 a year," is discouragingly small. But this statement is from the Denver Catholic, a weekly Catholic paper published in this city.

The figures first given are taken from the New York Independent of Jan. 4, 1901. According to these statistics the Catholic Church in the United States had an annual increase during the last decade of about 236,000. But this statement includes increase by immigration and not alone by conversion. When the fact is borne in mind that a large per cent. of the immigration to the United States from Europe is of Roman Catholics there is nothing in these figures especially encouraging to those who owe allegiance to the See of Rome.

The Rev. Daniel Dorchester, D. D., is a good authority on a subject of this character. His book entitled "The Problem of Religious Progress," was first published more than twenty years ago. It is a work, as you know, that deals largely in religious statistics. It is said that on its appearance Mr. Dana, at the time the brilliant editor of the New York Sun, employed an expert to examine critically the statistical tables, with the result that not a serious error was found. The Sun editorials on ecclesiastical, theological and religious topics have for years been favorable to the Roman Catholic Church. When Mr. Dana was in Rome, not long before his death, he had an audience with Leo XIII., and was in other ways honored by devotees of the church; yet, so far as I know, Mr. Charles Anderson Dana was not a communicant of the Catholic Church.

But to return to Dr. Dorchester and his statistics. In the Congregationalist, dated Dec. 29, 1900, is an article by the Rev. Daniel Dorchester, D. D., on the question, "Is the Church Still Gaining at the Close of the Century?" As to the comparative increase of the Roman Catholics and Protestants, I quote the following:

"Considered on the basis of the communicants alone, the Protestant evangelical churches are running steadily ahead of the Roman Catholics. While the evangelical communicants in the last decade gained only 25 per cent. of one inhabitant, the Roman Catholics in the same period lost 23 per cent. of one inhabitant. . . . The Roman Catholic rate of increase fell off from 2,212,636 from 1880 to 1890 to 1,549,711 from 1890 to 1900. I use the Roman Catholic yearbook for 1900 for the figures of that year. During the last decade the immigrants have been less numerous from Roman Catholic countries. Their greatest relative gain upon the population of the United States was in the two decades from 1850 to 1870, when a large Irish population, seven-eighths of whom are Roman Catholics, came to our shores."

From any point of view, from every point of view, the Roman Catholic outlook in the United States is not encouraging; but your pastor is not authorized to say that the Roman Catholic Church is dying out.

There are a number of reasons why this church in the United States cannot be what it is in Mexico, South America, Spain, Italy, or any other country which it dominates. Dr. Josiah Strong in his book, "Our Country," quotes from the "Cyclopedia of Education" for the year 1877 the following facts in regard to illiteracy in Roman Catholic countries. The rate of illiteracy in the Argentine Republic is 83 per cent., in Hungary it is 51 per cent., in Italy 73, in Mexico 93, in Poland 91, and in Spain 80 per cent. Roman Catholicism is not favorable to the education of the masses. This statement cannot be successfully controverted. The free school system and the Roman Catholic system are in deadly antagonism. The Roman Catholic Church cannot withstand our free schools, our free press, our free thought, our free speech, our free ballot, our open Bible freely circulated in the language of the people, our churches independent of state support, and our unhampered pulpit. Roman Catholicism cannot flourish in such an atmosphere as that of the United States.

Miss M. T. Elder is a niece of Archbishop Elder, of the Roman Catholic Church, and is herself a Catholic. In 1893 in connection with the "Congress of Religions" in Chicago, she said some things not palatable to Romanists. Recently she has called attention to the fact that Protestants, not Catholics, inaugurate such movements as the Young Men's Christian Associations, Young Women's Christian Associations, the King's Daughters, the Christian Endeavor movement, Summer Schools, Social Settlements for the rescue of "the submerged tenth," etc., and that what her own church is doing along these lines is but an imitation of what the Protestant churches are doing. This is not pleasant reading for Roman Catholics, but Miss Elder speaks the truth. There is great hope for our country in these movements among and in the interest of the young people. Protestants are training a great army of young men and young women "for Christ and the Church." In the United States there are more than 10,000,000 pupils and teachers in Protestant Sunday-schools. The members of Young Men's Christian Associations in North America number 228,568. In the Young Women's Christian Associations there are 35,000 members. The Young People's Christian Union numbers 70,000. The membership of the Luther League is 70,000. The Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip numbers 15,000 young men. The Brotherhood of St. Andrew numbers 12,000. The Epworth League has a membership of 1,900,000. In the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, the same organization has 306,580 members. The Baptist Young People's Union has about 1,000,000 members, and the latest report from John Willis Baer, Dec. 29, 1900, tells us that there are 3,640,000 Christian Endeavorers in the world. The Lord be praised!

Conquest of the World for Christ

By A. McLEAN

The Need of Patience.

Professor Clarke has done good service by showing that the conquest of the world for Christ is the longest, hardest and most exacting work ever undertaken by man. Over one thousand million souls remain to be evangelized. These people are not only to be discipled, but taught all that pertains to life and godliness. This is a vast work, and it requires time and energy and inexhaustible patience. The demand of common sense is that we settle down deliberately to it, intelligently, expecting a long pull, and planning to give to it our best strength for an indefinite time to come.

A Work of Education.

Those who expect to see a nation born in a day are certain to be disappointed. We are not authorized to look for any miracle. Faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of Christ. The nations must be taught. It is well known that teaching is a slow process. It is known, too, that in ages past the triumphs of the gospel were gradual and not instantaneous. It took three centuries to evangelize the Roman empire. It took a thousand years more to win the continent of Europe for Christ. There is no reason for holding that the conquests in this age will be more swift or more remarkable than they were then.

The Heathen are Satisfied.

There are those who believe that the non-Christian nations are eager to know the truth; that they are athirst for God; that they are waiting to welcome the herald and ready to receive His message with gladness and gratitude. It is not so. The non-Christian nations are not hungering and thirsting after righteousness. They are not aware of thier own lost condition and are not asking for the way of life and salvation. As a matter of fact they have no sense of sin and no desire to change their faith. They have ancient and venerated systems of their own, and they are satisfied with them. Here and there are noble spirits who are searching after God. Before the missionaries know enough of the language to answer their inquiries, they ask what they must do to be saved. But the great majority are joined to their idols and wish to be left alone. The sense of sin has to be created. People have to be shown what their true condition is. That takes time and much patient labor.

A Serious Business.

There are those who want to hear romantic tales from the mission fields. They want to be placed in direct communication with some evangelist or teacher or child. They desire photographs and biographical details. But this is a great work, and it needs a great purpose behind it. Christian people should adopt it, knowing what it is and knowing the strain upon time and patience and resources which it involves. We should go at this work as we do any other great enterprise. It requires business methods, common sense and statesmanship in administration, and dogged persistence that will admit no such thing as even the possibility of failure.

There would be no trouble in sustaining and carrying forward this work if the churches everywhere took it up in the way our Lord intended, and determined to labor gladly and patiently until it is done. If they would settle down intelligently to the real work of missions, making it one of their great concerns in life, long plans would be laid, deficits would be unknown, opportunities could be seized, and a work could be done worthy of Him whose name it bears. At this season of the year, when offerings are being made for world-wide missions, the churches should try to understand the magnitude of the task, and enter upon it as those who propose to carry it on until it is finished.

China's Greatest Need.

By W. Remfry Hunt.

An ambitious English general once asked the East India Company for an army of 50,000 men with which to conquer China. This proposed conquest by subjection never took place.

A humble Christian missionary named Morrison asked God for a few consecrated, self-sacrificing and courageous native Christians with whom he proposed to begin the moral transformation of the great heathen colossus.

Morrison worked under ground for twelve years by the light of a candle, translating scriptures, printing tracts and training helpers for the wide evangelization of the Chinese empire.

His work undermined idolatry and is to-day a living testimony of Christian devotion and sacrifice. One hundred thousand native Christians to-day enjoy an open Chinese Bible, and thousands have laid down their lives in their testimony to the gospel.

China's greatest need is evangelists. We need men of sterling character, Christian love, self-abnegating men, who will come to live and die for the Chinese. We need also trained native evangelists in thousands who will enter the newly opened fields.

The recent collision of Christian civilization and heathen power means a new era. Doors are opening anew. Spheres of influence will be wider than ever before. The break-up of heathenism introduces China into the family of Christian nations.

This is the nick of time. God is calling to us as a missionary people to go forward. We have put gold, men, women and faithful lives into China. Our work is rich with fruit and with achievement. But the great field calls for equipment, reinforcement and larger investment.

Every church, Y. P. S. C. E. and Sunday-school should have its own native missionary. This would enrich the Church in its spiritual wealth. Forty dollars a year will support an evangelist or Bible woman. Who will act? Chinese Evangelist Shi is supported by the Y. P. S. C. E. of Stanford Christian Church, Ill. This is a commendable example. We ought to have five hundred of such "witnessing churches."

It was through a native evangelist named "Fountain of Happiness" that Mr. Shi first heard the gospel story. These men are the future successful heralds of the new evangel. In city, village and mart they preach, proclaim and exhibit the gospel.

China has 1,700 walled cities and a million villages to be thoroughly evangelized. The imperative need is for men and means. One without the other means a stationary condition. Let us help in a practical way to add to the voices of the new evangel which shall ring in the true music of the new century in the pealing of the gospel bells unto the ends of the earth.

In Nankin, Lu Choe fu, Chu Cheo, Wuhu, Shanghai and Tsung Ming, we have a score of native preachers at work. They shine out like little stars in the gloom of heathendom. Some are able men. They are heroes of the true type. Their message has the ring of true gold. They endure hardness and enjoy the service. Their pleading prayers would move the churches into action: "Lord of the imperial commission, send us more ambassadors, the fields are so wide and the laborers so few."

The native preachers and converts do not know the small percentage of those at home that contribute to missions. If they knew it, their faith would be assailed. A Chinaman does not believe in a religion that costs nothing. He reads the meaning of the gospel in the cross.

Oh that the March offering shall be such a steady, full and quick-march offering that the greatest needs of the heathen fields shall be satisfied, the hearts of the toil-tried workers cheered, and the supreme commission of the Savior gladly and universally obeyed.

A VISIT TO MOUNT VERNON

By EDWARD B. BAGBY

Mt. Vernon is the Mecca of all visitors to the nation's capital. Those who have never made the pilgrimage are invited to accompany us to-day to this hallowed place. A choice of two routes confronts us. As it is an imaginary trip we can go by water and return by land without extra expense.

The steamer Macalester has scarcely left the pier when the grounds of the Arsenal come into view. The buildings peeping through interstices of stately trees, wide stretches of lawn and weeping willows that droop their branches to the water's edge, give the impression that this must be some peaceful sylvan retreat. As we approach we see the cannon, piles of shot and shell and soldiers drilling upon the lawn and are reminded of the grim work in which Uncle Sam has of late engaged.

The building which crowns the bluff at the mouth of the Anacostia river is not, as you might suppose, an old baronial mansion with lofty towers and battlemented stories, but the Government Hospital for the Insane.

Having left Alexandria, which is the only stopping place, we have time during the ride of ten miles to consult the guide books and learn something of the Potomac and the home of Washington. The Mount Vernon Estate is owned and controlled by the Mt. Vernon Ladies' Association. The sum of $200,000 was raised by them to purchase the property. The income derived from a small admission fee is sufficient for the maintenance of the buildings and grounds and for the purchase of valuable relics.

The broadening Potomac reminds us of the story of how Edward Everett when Secretary of State was conducting a party of diplomats to Mt. Vernon. He told them of how Washington was said to have thrown a silver dollar across the river at this point. The French Minister said he did not believe it possible for a man to throw such a distance. Mr. Everett replied, "Well, you see a dollar went a good deal farther in those days than now," which is a good story to tell on church extension day with the proper application.

The tolling of the steamer's bell reminds us that we are now passing the tomb of Washington. This beautiful custom is said to owe its origin to Commodore Gordon of the British Navy who ordered his ship's bell to be tolled while passing Mt. Vernon in 1814. This recalls the fact that Washington's home is named in honor of another representative of the British Navy, Admiral Vernon, with whom Lawrence Washington served before Carthagena.

After landing we have no trouble in finding the famous tomb, for the crowd files slowly up the hill, passing the weeping willows which were brought from Napoleon's grave at St. Helena to the spot where lies all that is mortal of the Father of his Country.

Nor shall we lack for information. An old colored guide, who for years was a slave on the plantation, is on hand to instruct us. The tomb of plain brick is after a plan drawn by Washington himself. The marble sarcophagi of General and Mrs. Washington occupy the ante-room to the vault and the inscriptions can be plainly read. On a simple slab above is the verse, "I am the resurrection and the life. He that believeth in me, though he were dead yet shall he live." In the vault back of the ante-room are the bodies of thirty or more members of the Washington family.

Leaving the tomb we climb the hill to the mansion, passing the old coach house and see the style of conveyance used a hundred years before the automobile was thought of. We are not sorry that our entrance to the mansion should be through the kitchen. There we find a bountiful supply of eatables for sale. As we examine the big fireplace, clumsy pothooks and cooking utensils of the olden time, as true and hungry patriots we eat and drink for the benefit of the Mt. Vernon Association and ourselves. As we pass into the house we find the walls lined with cabinets filled with interesting relics. Here is a key of the Bastille sent to Washington by Lafayette in 1789, just after the destruction of the famous French prison. "It is a tribute," wrote the donor, "which I owe as a son to my adopted father, as a missionary of liberty to its patriarch." Here is the sword used by General Washington in battle and a footstool used in church. We are told that there are seventeen secret doors in the wainscoting leading to closets and wonder to what use they could have been put.

The airy sleeping rooms upstairs are more interesting than the confusing mass of relics below. The cosiest of the rooms is that of Nellie Custis. We step into the room in which Washington died. All the furniture here was used by him and the bedstead is the one upon which he breathed his last. We climb a crooked stairway to the third story to find the apartment occupied by Mrs. Washington after her husband's death. By the window yonder the disconsolate widow would sit for hours and look out upon the lonely grave, and during the year and a half she survived her husband refused to be comforted. We call upon the guide to confirm this tradition. "No," he says, "that is a popular mistake. She never isolated herself. Her descendants have written that she continued to preside with her wonted grace and dignity until she died."

The trip home on the trolley with a stop at Alexandria and a visit to the old Christ Church ends a delightful day.

Progress In Japan.

By Bertha Clawson.

Christmas has come and gone, and when we think of it as it was celebrated in our little Japanese Sunday-school, a glad joy steals into our heart of hearts. Where last year we had a howling mob of dirty, untrained children with an illy-prepared program, this year we had an orderly, well-trained class of thirty-four boys and girls, ranging in ages between eighteen years and mere babies (not in arms) on back, who came in their prettiest dresses, with faces clean and hair tidy, and sang from memory their beautiful songs and recited without promptings their Scripture verses which tell the story of the lovely Babe of Bethlehem.

This simple entertainment was more wonderful to us than the splendid cantatas that it was the privilege of many of you to hear. To many of you, perhaps, their music would not have been music, and their simple recitations would have been meaningless, but to us their songs were sweetest music and their words were full of meaning. One item of success was the fact that we had present as guests of the evening about thirty grown people — mothers, sisters, brothers and friends of the children, many of whom came for the first time into the little preaching place, and some of whom heard for the first time from the mouths of the little children the "old story ever new." Our great ambition is to reach these same fathers, mothers, sisters and brothers of our children with the gospel, but one thing greatly hinders our quickly accomplishing this. Our preaching place is only a poor little Japanese home which, if the people were packed into it, would not hold more than one hundred and fifty people. All shoes must be removed at the door; all must sit on the floor on mats; the house is heated by a few live charcoals in a fire box, the room meanwhile reeking with gaseous fumes. In such a room, poorly lighted and poorly ventilated, all must sit if they care to attend the service. Many of the best people will not submit to these things, because they consider it beneath their dignity to visit a house that is not equally as good as their own homes. Besides, many Japanese men have adopted the foreign customs in dress, and do not care to take the time to attend a service where they must remove their shoes, nor to undergo the torture of sitting on the floor in foreign costume. You may say this ought not to be so, yet if you will stop to consider, you may remember that even in Christian America people do not care to discommode themselves too much to attend public worship, and we ought not to expect any more from people who are totally ignorant even of the first principles of Christianity. It takes even more to hold the young people in Japan than it does at home, and they are not to be too severely criticised if they prefer to attend the services of the denominations about us who have beautiful houses of worship with all the modern conveniences.

We have in Osaka a young man who is cashier in one of the leading banks who was baptized by Bro. Stevens in the early days, who worships with the Congregationalists here, because he is ashamed of our surroundings. Again, when we have a candidate for baptism, we must either take him to the river where the scene may be witnessed by a scoffing mob, to whom the service so sacred to us has not a particle of meaning, or we must go across the city to our Baptist brethren and borrow from them the use of their baptistry; either of which lowers the dignity and impressiveness of the service. You see my point. We need a new chapel, and we feel that we must have it this year if we are expected to do our best work in Osaka the first year in the new century. The watchword among Japanese pastors and evangelists is, "The evangelization of Japan in the present generation." The board cannot meet all the demands that will be made upon its resources this year, maybe. The Lord has blessed us abundantly in the past. He will bless us still more abundantly if you, out of your exceeding abundance, will make it possible for the board to grant our request this year.

Osaka, Japan.

The Great Commission.

By Charles Louis Loos.

What is the "strong rock" on which the impregnable argument for the evangelization of the whole world rests? It is the commission given by our Lord to his disciples on the Mount of Ascension. To the entire church such a positive mandate from its King should come with a power of authority that would at once and forever command prompt and universal obedience. As the prophet Isaiah, in sublimest language, has said:

> "Hear, O ye heavens,
> And give ear, thou earth,
> For Jehovah has spoken!"

With such profoundest reverence Christians should evermore hear the voice of the Almighty.

No more momentous command, none delivered on an occasion of higher importance, or clothed in words of greater authority, was ever given by God to men, than the charge given to the church to preach the gospel to all the nations.

What are the qualities of this divine command?

First, it is an expression of the will of God that embodies his supreme authority before which the universe must bow. Secondly, it is a revelation of his wisdom. Finally, it has for its motive the unspeakably gracious purpose of God to save the human race. What sinful presumption, therefore, it would be, before heaven and earth, for us by our foolish reasonings to seek to make void and thwart the will and wisdom of the most high God, to strive to make of no effect this charge of highest and holiest purpose and of vastest design, fraught with infinite love and mercy for our fallen race.

That which gives this command of our Lord the supremest importance is that it is the expression of the perfected development of God's plan to save the world. The preparatory dispensation of the Old Testament had fulfilled its mission. Jesus had come, the desire of all nations, the Messiah of the prophets. He had lived, labored and suffered on the cross; had been buried and had risen again from the dead in "fulfillment of Moses, the Law and the Prophets." His dying words were, "It is finished!" The last, the greatest, and most glorious age in the execution of God's designs with the world, that was to end in the restoration of all things, in a new heaven and a new earth, with his triumph over all his enemies, was now to begin.

Standing on the Mount of Ascension, now clothed with "all authority in heaven and on the earth," Jesus proclaims the solemn decree that shall be a law to his people for all ages—"to the end of the world."

The momentous significance of this divine behest to the church lies in this, that it declares what its great office shall be as the minister of its Sovereign Head in the consummation of the transcendently glorious designs of his kingdom on earth. In the presence of this command no language can worthily express the tremendous weight of obligation that will, through all time, rest upon the church.

And let us consider well, also, that if this charge had not been committed by our Lord to his disciples, neither the apostles in their day, nor any evangelists in aftertimes,would have gone forth to preach the gospel to the world; indeed, there would have been no apostolic nor evangelistic office. On this commission and its execution the destiny of the kingdom of the Messiah on this earth depends.

Does any one in the spirit of contradiction say that this command was given only to the disciples to whom it was immediately delivered and that it does not extend to the church in after times? To such we answer:

The tenor of the command is to "go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature"—to the whole creation; to "go and make disciples of all nations."

These words declare the universality of God's purpose, a purpose that has never yet been fulfilled. The gospel has never yet been preached to every creature, it has not yet reached all nations, nor accomplished its work with them. But shall this "vast design" of heaven fail? This cannot be. The church has not yet executed the task appointed to it of God. Therefore, until the gospel has been preached in every land and to all the inhabitants of it, and with persistence, power and effect, this great commission will rest with all its weight upon the church. For it is not only to be thus universally preached, but so preached as to make disciples, i. e., followers of Christ, of them; they must be effectually instructed in all things whatsoever our Lord has commanded his apostles to teach. The church must execute this order of our king to the utmost extent of its meaning.

But can this great victory be achieved? Let it be noted that the doubt involved in such a question is wholly unknown to the New Testament. No apostle, no enlightened believer, nor the spirit of the Apocalypse, looking to the very end of all time, ever uttered such a doubt. This alone should suffice to quell all such unbelieving questionings.

No! An interpretation of the great commission that would either limit it to the apostolic age, or justify any misgivings as to its final victorious execution, is utterly impossible.

Thus Jehovah speaks by the mouth of the prophet Isaiah: "The word that goeth out of my mouth shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in that whereunto I send it." "I have sworn by myself that unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall confess."

The seventh chapter of Revelation unfolds to us the scene, sublime beyond description, which heaven and earth shall witness when the entire drama of human history shall have been ended.

There shall stand before the throne and before the Lamb an innumerable multitude of the redeemed of all nations, and kindreds, and peoples, and tongues, clothed with white robes of righteousness and palms of victory in their hands. The history of the world unrolls before us the records of the mighty triumphs the cross has won through the ages, in lifting up great nations from the deepest depths of heathenism into the glorious light and life of the Christian faith. The power revealed and the victories won by the gospel in these latest times constitute the most wonderful chapter in the annals of our own age.

Had the church been obedient to the command of its King throughout the two millenniums past, the gospel of salvation would long since have been preached over all the earth.

But we are sure in the firm conviction and soul-entrancing hope that we are now living in the radiant morn of the victorious missionary age of the world that with mighty progress bears the triumphant banner of the cross over every continent, and plants it in every island of the seas, until "all the kingdoms of the world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ."

Blessed is he that so believes and that joyfully labors with God to this glorious end!

Archbishop Kain has recently given out an argument against compulsory education which presents some curious features. His ostensible objection is on the ground that the enforcement of the law may involve a degree of "prying into family affairs" which is distasteful to him and inconsistent with his democratic ideas. The law excuses from school attendance children who have no proper clothing and those whose services are absolutely necessary to the support of the family, and to determine whether or not these excuses apply in any particular case, the officer must "pry" into the family's affairs. For a distinguished prelate in a church which has a confessional and authorizes its priests to probe to the bottom of the soul and uncover the hidden thought which had not yet even risen to the surface of consciousness, to protest against such "prying" as is necessary to find out whether a child's absence from school is due to real necessity or to the indifference of its parents, is a curious spectacle. No, the argument will not do. No one can be reasonably expected to believe that the archbishop really objects to "prying". What he objects to is education outside of the parochial schools.

Current Literature.

In its purpose, plan and fundamental idea, S. Law Wilson's Theology of Modern Literature reminds one of Prof. Strong's "Great Poets and Their Theology." Both are literary criticisms from a standpoint other than that of the professional literary critic. Both are attempts to collect and systematize what has been said by some of the world's great writers about God and His relations to the world and to men. The scope of the book is, of course, different, for, while Prof. Strong includes the great poets of all lands and ages—Dante, Shakespeare, Milton, Goethe, as well as the more recent masters—Mr. Wilson's book deals only with English literature in the nineteenth century and his most important chapters are on Tennyson, Carlyle, Browning, Arnold and Mrs. Humphry Ward. One cannot, of course, give an adequate view of the attitude of modern literature toward religious questions without including Mrs. Ward and the large class of contemporary writers which she represents. But one cannot escape a certain sense of incongruity in the juxtaposition of her name with those of the really great in literature. Matthew Arnold was not orthodox, but at least he did not use his doubts as a stock in trade; and one can but feel that some of our contemporary iconoclasts have attempted to make capital of the heresy which they boast—and that that is about all the capital they have. Mr. Wilson's book is valuable in giving clear recognition to the fact that the men who rise to the highest eminence as thinkers of great thoughts and as spokesmen for a world of silent thinkers, cannot choose but speak of God and His relations to man, whether or not they have the conscious purpose of teaching religion. His treatment furnishes a useful and convenient guide to the study of modern literature from the religious point of view. (T. & T. Clark.)

I cannot forgive Mr. Stockton for seizing upon a title, A Bicycle of Cathay, which I had already spoken for. It seemed such an easy and obvious thing, to take that phrase from "Locksley Hall," "A cycle in Cathay," and use it as the title of something different from what was in the poet's mind when he wrote it. Probably many have had the same thought, but Mr. Stockton has gotten ahead of us all. In the story which bears this title there appears no diminution in his power of constructing a plot at once absurd and plausible, at once curiously complicated and transparently clear, and his style is still as colorless and inconspicuous as ever—a style that one never notices, a style which never calls attention from the story to itself. Perhaps that is one reason why his wildest vagaries of fancy are always so easy to believe. There is the same fertility in the invention of unhackneyed episodes and the construction of novel situations out of a few simple elements. A young man, the teacher of a village school, starts upon a summer cycling tour wherever fancy may call him, and the land of his fancy he nicknames "Cathay," for no apparent reason except to utilize the pun on Tennyson's famous line. The young man develops a marvelous facility for making the acquaintance of interesting young women. He is entertained by an heiress, proposes marriage to an inn-keeping widow, comes into sudden possession of a tame bear, stops a runaway horse, gets himself psychologically dissected by the young woman whom he has saved, and finally marries the doctor's daughter in his own village, whose parting gift as he started on his tour had been a box of quinine pills. (Harpers. $1.50.)

F. N. Peloubet, widely known as the author of the annual "Select Notes" on the Sunday-school lessons, has issued The Teacher's Commentary on Matthew. It is a work for laymen and presupposes in its readers neither the disposition nor the equipment for minute and scholarly study. The harmony of the life of Christ, given among other introductory matter, differs only in minute details from the arrangement in Stevens and Burton's well-known and invaluable Harmony. The commentary follows the text verse by verse but introduces considerable matter of an archeological and historical sort. It is not homiletical and is the better for that. The author has as much trouble as most commentators do in explaining Matthew 24, maintaining the usual theory that the discourse on the Last Things mingles the answers to two questions, the destruction of the temple and the second coming of Christ. (Oxford University Press, American Branch.)

Maurice Thompson, whose death on February 15 was an event much to be regretted in the literary world, did not achieve his highest artistic triumph in the book which brought him the most fame and money. My Winter Garden is better literature ten to one than the more famous "Alice of Old Vincennes." It was the story and not the style which won for the latter its popularity. "My Winter Garden" is not a story but a group of descriptions and reflections connected with a winter sojourn, or a series of winter sojourns, on the Gulf Coast. It is in the same vein and spirit as "Elizabeth and Her German Garden" and its style is so good, its atmosphere so clear and its flavor so delightful, that it is a matter rather of private taste than of literary criticism whether one shall not say that it is even better than that anonymous prose idyl (Century Company, $1.50.)

Mr. Frederic Harrison writing in the Fortnightly Review compares Walter Scott's picture of Richard Coeur de Lion with that which Mr. Hewlett presents in "Richard Yea-and-Nay." After pointing out the fact that Scott, following the method which was habitual with him in dealing with historic characters, gives Richard only a subordinate place in "The Talisman" and gives only a glance of him in "Ivanhoe," while Mr. Hewlett keeps his royal hero in the center of the stage from beginning to end, Mr. Harrison says: "Scott's immortal pictures of chivalry are poems, Faery Queen idealizations of a world seen in an imaginative dreamland, from which the gross and savage realities are purged. Mr. Hewlett bravely sets himself to rehearse sublimities and savageries in black and white, as set down by men of the time, who thought heaven and hell to be equally real and all men and women equally destined for one or the other, according to their diligence in masses and prayer."

The publishers of "The Reign of Law" have issued a little booklet containing President McGarvey's criticism of the book, Mr. Allen's reply to President McGarvey, and several opinions both pro and con taken, for the most part, from sermons. The publishers in their preface still speak of "The Brotherhood of Christ" as the name of the denomination from which the hero of the story is supposed to have been cast out, and they contrast this body with "those religious denominations who have availed themselves of the broad teaching of modern religious scholars." Here, as is often the case, ignorance and arrogance are exhibited in the same sentence.

As the winter months pass away and signs of approaching spring are seen in the land (there happens to be a snow-storm to-day, but no matter) the fancy of the suburbanite, as well as of the farmer, lightly turns to thoughts of spring vegetables and early flowers. Ferry's Seed Annual, representing the well-known firm of D. M. Ferry & Co., of Detroit, presents a list of the sort of green-goods against which there is no law. We have received also a package of seeds which we would take great pleasure in using were it not for the inherent difficulty involved in raising a corn crop on a window-sill or a cabbage bed in a jardiniere.

A new serial by the author of "Eben Holden" will begin in the March Century and run for six months. The title is "D'ri and I," its scene is the region of Lake Champlain, and its time 1812.

It is worth while to call attention to the extent to which the Revell Company has become the publisher of missionary literature. Their recently published catalogue of missionary books includes a large proportion of the best recent works.

The frugal and discriminating reader will be glad to know that a cheaper edition, still fully illustrated, of Mabie's "William Shakespeare" has been issued. The decrease of price from $6.00 to $3.50 ought to gain it many new readers. (Macmillan.)

Unique among the records of recent wars is Mortimer Menpes' "War Impressions." The author is more artist than writer and the feature of his book is its seventy-five illustrations in color, reproduced by an entirely new process. The book will appear shortly from the press of the Macmillan Company.

A new interest is aroused in "The Colombian and Venezuelan Republics," by Hon. William M. Scruggs, by reason of the present disturbances in those countries and the possibility of our being brought into close and possibly unfriendly relations with one of them.

The Missionary Review of the World this month is devoted especially to China. An account as full as possible is given of the murder of the missionaries in the interior. A flight through Siberia to escape the Boxers is described, and Dr. Griffith John writes of the anti-foreign crusade in China.

Nixon Waterman's new magazine, Good Cheer, lives up to its name about as well as any periodical on the market. It is light enough to be lively, but is cheerful without being flippant. There are a good many of Mr. Waterman's poems in each number and many editorial paragraphs embodying his whimsical and sagacious philosophy. The opening article is a sketch of Ben King by the editor, who collected and edited the popular volume of Ben King's verse.

"Sweet" Eaters.

Way to Correct Children's Taste.

Sometimes children become wilful and refuse nourishing food, demanding sweets, candy, ice cream, etc., much to their detriment. It is a great help in such cases to have a food that is naturally sweet and attractive. A case in Phila. will illustrate.

The daughter of Mrs. M. E. Searles, living at 1330 Mifflin St., was a delicate child from infancy and had been indulged in many things. She gradually got thinner and more fretful daily, refusing food other than sweets, etc., finally contracting whooping cough which undermined her health to such an extent that her attending physicians agreed that her cough had developed into bronchial catarrh, and that only a short time would ensue before consumption would relieve her sufferings.

In despair, the child's aunt was sent for, and knowing the wonderful nutritive value of Grape-Nuts food, she prepared some and induced the little one to eat it. At the first taste she said: "Oh, auntie, this is so nice, I want some more" From that time the child acquired an appetite and began to improve. She was fed on Grape-Nuts steadily until now she is a perfectly healthy, strong child, attends the Girls' Grammar School, and is a bright and apt pupil.

Our Budget.

—Foreign Mission Day, March 3.

—Don't forget it. Don't neglect it. Don't postpone it.

—Preach for it. Pray for it. Beg for it. Give for it.

—Procrastination is the thief of other things than time. Take the offering on the first Lord's day in March.

—If your church is strong, the cause of Foreign Missions needs your help. If your church is weak, the cause needs the few dollars you can give and the church needs the inspiration which will come with giving them.

—"I nevah knowed a chuch to die ob givin' too much," said the colored preacher. "And if I evah finds such a chuch, I'll stan' befoe dat chuch an' lif' up my han's an' say: 'Blessed am de dead what die in de Lawd'."

—The offerings this year should be on a more generous scale than ever before. The country is prosperous; money is abundant. Hitherto the average offering has been less than it should have been. The gifts on the first Sunday in March should be worthy of the great cause of missions, and worthy of the divine Lord whom we serve.

—The program of the Florida State Convention which will be held in Jacksonville, Feb. 25-27, reached us too late for publication in full. The C. W. B. M. has a large place on the program and an excellent list of speakers and subjects. In the remainder of the program the names of Miss Adelaide Gail Frost, C. C. Smith and A. McLean, among others, insure a profitable session.

—Joseph Lowe writes from Bakersfield, Cal., that the ladies of the church there, organized under the name of the Golden Rule Association, have built a ten-room house on the church lot, which rents for $40 a month, which is equivalent to a permanent endowment for the church. The Endeavor Society has adopted on orphan boy in India and named him Paul Bakersfield.

—The trustees of the United Society of Christian Endeavor in their recent meeting at Portland, Me., took two important actions: First, it was decided henceforth to hold the international convention bi-annually instead of annually and to recommend the holding of state conventions in alternate years. Second, it was decided that acceptance of the particular form of pledge which has hitherto been in use shall not be required so long as the fundamental principles of Christian Endeavor are observed.

—President D. R. Dungan, of Christian University at Canton, Mo., reports that the Hawkins' Literary Society gave a reception to the faculty and students Feb. 8, which was largely attended and highly satisfactory. A program of an hour was followed by a six course banquet. This entertainment is to be followed by a number of lectures, five of which will be given by B. L. Smith, of Cincinnati, and one by L. H. Stine, of Quincy. A smallpox quarantine has seriously interfered with the school since the holidays.

—The following extract from a letter from P. S. Olson, Wilno, Minn., gives an idea of what frontier missionary work is like: "Here on a new railroad is a town already incorporated and forty thriving places of business, where six months ago there was only a wheat field. I preached every Sunday in the Chicago and Northwestern railroad depot waiting room, the only available place. This field and call seem wholly providential so far as my effort is concerned. I came here after the death of my dear companion, because opportunity was offered for the care of my children, and almost before I knew it a real mission field came to my door."

—T. D. Garvin has decided not to return to Honolulu. He is preaching now for the church at Los Angeles.

—E. L. Burch moves from Portland, Ore., to become general secretary of the Y. M. C. A., at Stockton, Cal.

—A. F. Sanderson, of Keokuk, will assist James T. Nichols, of Vinton, in a short meeting, beginning Feb. 20.

—The Foreign Society has just received $1,690 in three gifts. One direct gift of $690 and the remainder on the annuity plan.

—G. A. Griffith, late of Crowell, Texas, and now at 13 Jones St., Ashtabula, O., can be engaged for evangelistic work beginning at once.

—The congregation at Clay Center, Neb., is preparing to erect a handsome building during the summer. It will be complete in every respect, even to dining hall and kitchen.

—W. W. Hopkins, formerly assistant editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and widely known as an able speaker and writer, is open to engagements for the evangelistic work. He can be addressed at Kirkwood, Mo.

—At the St. Louis Ministers' meeting held at the office of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST last Monday, there was a discussion of the temperance crusade in Kansas. It was a lively meeting and all opinions were presented and defended.

—The executive committee of the Orphans' Home, of Louisville, Ky., is gratified with the results of the efforts to raise a $50,000 endowment. About $14,000 has now been subscribed. Send a dollar or two now before you forget it to Robert H. Otter, Box 300, Louisville, Ky.

—If churches have no stated minister, they should not on that account neglect the offering for Foreign Missions. This duty is not contingent on having a minister. This is the work of the whole body of believers. Every redeemed soul should have fellowship with Christ in His efforts to save the whole world.

—If churches are in debt, or are putting up a building, or are in a series of meetings, or are weak, they should still do something for Foreign Missions. This duty will not interfere with any other. On the contrary, it will make it easier for the church to perform its other duties.

—We publish elsewhere an appeal from Chancellor Craig in behalf of Drake University. Drake needs no commendation from us. It is an institution of great actualities and greater possibilities, and the brethren in Iowa and elsewhere should give it the means of doing the best possible grade of work. Read Chancellor Craig's statement in another column.

—A correspondent in the east calls our attention to some facts about the work of women of our New York (state) churches which deserve recognition. There are 37 auxiliaries having 1,417 members, an increase of 457 during the last year. They raised for all purposes an average of $2.10 per member, or nearly $3,000. The auxiliary at Jefferson Street, Buffalo, has 102 members and that of the Richmond Avenue Church, Buffalo, has 130 members and contributed nearly $3 per member. This is an exhibition of missionary zeal and enterprise which is worthy of emulation.

Scrofula

Is a disease as old as antiquity, and as young as the newest born infant.

It has infested the blood of humanity from ancient times down to the present minute.

It is hereditary or may be acquired.

It appears in swollen glands, scrofulous sores, hip disease, boils, pimples, eruptions, and, as believed by high authorities, even in the forms of catarrh and rheumatism.

It can be cured by taking Hood's Sarsaparilla faithfully and persistently.

We know this, because Hood's Sarsaparilla has done it.

It will cure you if you give it a trial.

You should begin to take it today.

Hip Disease—"I suffered from hip disease; had 5 running sores; used crutches and each winter I was confined to my bed for weeks at a time. Hood's Sarsaparilla has accomplished a perfect cure—saved my life. I have a good appetite and feel strong and well." ANNIE ROBERT, 49 Fourth St., Fall River, Mass.

In Her Eyes—"My little girl had scrofula and sores appeared in her eyes. A few bottles of Hood's Sarsaparilla entirely cured her and she has never had scrofula since." MRS. HOWARD POPE, Alpha, Oregon.

N. B. If you decide to take Hood's Sarsaparilla do not be induced to buy any other.

—The following letter contains the fullest information which we have received concerning the death of Bro. McConnell:

CEDAR RAPIDS, IA., Feb. 17.

Rev. N. A. McConnell died suddenly at Cedar Rapids, Ia., on Wednesday morning at 9:10, Feb. 6, 1901. He had attended the funeral of his sister at Urbana on the Sunday previous, returning Tuesday night, driving six miles to the train. From the depot in Cedar Rapids he went to the church and from the church to his home, which was with his daughter, Mrs. H. F. White, arriving there about 9:00 P. M. He talked with the family an hour. Seemed in good spirits and said he was well.

The next morning he did not respond when called to breakfast, and on going to his room he was found to be unconscious. A physician was called who said he was suffering from capillary bronchitis, and that he was dying. The funeral services were held Friday P. M. at 3.00 in the First Christian Church, Rev. J. M. Rudy officiating; interred at Marshalltown, Ia., Feb. 9, 1901. He was 77 years old on Jan. 23. He leaves two daughters, Mrs. Mary C. Huffaker, of Des Moines, and Mrs. H. F. White, of Cedar Rapids, Ia. H. F. WHITE.

—The following are some choice bits which were uttered at the Christian Endeavor anniversary at Portland, Me., as reported to the Christian Endeavor World:

Apropos to his discussion of Portland saloons, Dr. Burrell told the story of a German who had just arrived in Minneapolis, and saw the sign of Helfendstine over a saloon. He read it slowly and painfully: "'H-e-l'—Hell—'f-e-n-d-s-t'—fenced—'i-n-e'—in,—Hell fenced in."

WOMAN'S KIDNEYS.

Women as Well as Men Suffer and Are Made Miserable by Kidney and Bladder Troubles.

To Prove What SWAMP-ROOT, the Great Kidney Remedy, will do for YOU, Every Reader of the "Christian-Evangelist" May Have a Sample Bottle Sent Free by Mail.

Among the many famous cures of Swamp-Root, none seem to speak higher of the wonderful curative properties of this great kidney remedy than the one published this week for the benefit of CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST readers.

Mrs. H. N. Wheeler, of 117 High Rock St., Lynn, Mass., writes on Nov. 2, 1900: "About 18 months ago I had a very severe spell of sickness. I was extremely sick for three weeks, and when I finally was able to leave my bed I was left with excruciating pains in my back. My water at times looked very like coffee. I could pass but little at a time, and then only after suffering great pain. My physical condition was such that I had no strength and was all run down. The doctors said my kidneys were not affected, and while I

Did Not Know I Had Kidney Trouble,

I somehow felt certain that my kidneys were the cause of my trouble. My sister, Mrs. C. E. Littlefield, of Lynn, advised me to give Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root a trial. I procured a bottle and inside of three days commenced to get relief. I followed up that bottle with another, and at the completion of this one found I was completely cured. My strength returned, and to-day I am as well as ever. My business is that of canvasser, I am on my feet a great deal of the time, and have to use much energy in getting around. My cure is therefore all the more remarkable, and is exceedingly gratifying to me." MRS. H. N. WHEELER.

Swamp-Root will do just as much for any housewife whose back is too weak to perform her necessary work, who is always tired and overwrought, who feels that the cares of life are more than she can stand. It is a boon to the weak and ailing.

MRS. H. N. WHEELER.

How to Find Out If You Need Swamp-Root.

It used to be considered that only urinary and bladder troubles were to be traced to the kidneys; but now modern science proves that nearly all diseases have their beginning in the disorder of these most important organs.

The kidneys filter and purify the blood—that is their work. So when your kidneys are weak or out of order, you can understand how quickly your entire body is affected, and how every organ seems to fail to do its duty.

If you are sick or "feel badly," begin taking the famous new discovery, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, because as soon as your kidneys are well they will help all the other organs to health. A trial will convince anyone.

Many women suffer untold misery because the nature of their disease is not correctly understood. They are led to believe that womb trouble or female weakness of some sort is responsible for the many ills that beset womankind.

Neuralgia, nervousness, headache, puffy or dark circles under the eyes, rheumatism, a dragging pain or dull ache in the back, weakness or bearing down sensation, profuse or scanty supply of urine, with strong odor, frequent desire to pass it night or day, with scalding or burning sensation,—these are all unmistakable signs of kidney and bladder trouble.

If there is any doubt in your mind as to your condition, take from your urine on rising about four ounces, place it in a glass or bottle and let it stand twenty-four hours. If on examination it is milky or cloudy, if there is a brick-dust settling, or if small particles float about in it, your kidneys are in need of immediate attention.

Other symptoms showing that you need Swamp-Root are sleeplessness, dizziness, irregular heart, breathlessness, sallow, unhealthy complexion, plenty of ambition but no strength.

Swamp-Root is pleasant to take and is used in the leading hospitals, recommended by physicians in their private practice, and is taken by doctors themselves, because they recognize in it the greatest and most successful remedy that science has ever been able to compound.

If you are already convinced that Swamp-Root is what you need, you can purchase the regular fifty-cent and one-dollar bottles at the drug stores everywhere.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Swamp-Root, the great Kidney, Liver and Bladder remedy, is so remarkably successful that a special arrangement has been made by which all of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST readers who have not already tried it may have a sample bottle sent absolutely free by mail. Also a book telling all about kidney and bladder troubles and containing many of the thousands upon thousands of testimonial letters received from men and women cured by Swamp-Root. Be sure and mention reading this generous offer in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, St. Louis, when sending your address to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y.

—The Central Church, of Indianapolis, on Feb. 10 raised $1,500 and completely wiped out its debt. There was a debt of $9,000 when A. B. Philputt began his pastorate three years ago. The property has cost $50,000 and is now clear. On next Sunday Bro. Philputt, as chaplain of the Sons of the Revolution, will preach a Washington's birthday sermon, on which occasion several patriotic organizations will attend in a body.

—W. F. Hamann will preach his last sermon as pastor of the Fifth Church, this city, Feb. 24, and leave next week for his new field at Windsor, Mo. The church tendered him a farewell reception Thursday night, the 21st inst. J. F. Quisenberry, of Canton, Mo., his successor, will take charge March 3. Mr. Hamann has done a most excellent work in south St. Louis, and has made many sacrifices for it.

Wisconsin Items.

As the newly chosen state evangelist of Wisconsin, I arise to make my bow. I have not entered into any meeting as yet; have met with most of the members.

Executive Board the first of this month at Madison. The brethren have shown wisdom in the selection of those to lead in the mission work of the state.

I have visited Platteville, Werley and Pardeeville. While they are weak organizations, they all deserve much credit for their faithfulness. Platteville seems much encouraged since the meeting I held for them in December. Werley has a neat little church house all paid for. Pardeeville has the best house in the town. While they are still in debt they can easily manage it. They seemed well pleased with their state evangelist and urgently insisted he should return soon.

I came to Chilton yesterday and am to preach my first sermon in the "Union Church" to-night. There is not an English speaking resident minister in the town of 1,400 inhabitants, although it is a county-seat. We have three sisters in the town. Brother Brokaw is the only one of our brethren who ever preached here.

Brethren, I ask your prayers, your counsel and your sympathy. I am much pleased with the acquaintances I have thus far formed, and hope this is only an earnest of a larger and fuller acquaintanceship that will lead to great results in the building up of the kingdom.

My permanent address is Oelwein, Ia., where my family still resides.

Drake University.

Drake University appeals to the brotherhood for $500,000 additional endowment. We have no power to tax the people, we can only appeal in the name of Christian love and loyalty. The institution has earned the confidence of its friends. In less than twenty years it has made its way to the front rank of Iowa educational institutions. Last year it enrolled 1,003 students in the college year and 590 in the summer schools making a total of 1,593. This year the enrollment will exceed 1,700.

The location is all the most exacting could ask for. Des Moines is the capital and chief city of the state. State and city libraries with the state historical department give the student unusual advantages.

We have outgrown our accommodations and resources. Our income is insufficient to care for the students who throng our halls and those who are planning to come. Help us to provide for them and we will soon have an institution with a national reputation.

Governor Drake has already given $150,000. He will give $25,000 more if we will raise $75,000 before June and thus complete the first $100,000. The day for larger things is here. We have 125 young men preparing for the ministry, and they ought to have every possible advantage. We have students from 23 states and from foreign lands. We have many shades of religious belief in the student body. We have hearty support from the city of Des Moines.

Many disciples responded to the call to help Hiram College and all are gratified by the result. It has strengthened and encouraged a most deserving college. It seems to be Drake's turn now. We have secured A. J. Marshall and Joel Brown to help in the canvass in Iowa and surrounding territory. These brethren are well and favorably known. We bespeak for them a hearty welcome and co-operation. Many who will read this we cannot reach by personal solicitation. Save us the expense and the necessity of that by responding to this appeal on your own motion. Any amount from $1.00 to $100,000 will be acceptable. WM. BAYARD CRAIG, Chancellor.

A United Protestantism.

EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—There is scarcely a Protestant religious people to-day that does not favor Christian unity. The time seems to be approaching for some decided move toward the consummation of this much desired object. In the meantime, creeds are made, patched and discarded, as the case may be, that they may fit the progress of the creed-makers. One of the great evangelical bodies is rapidly approaching the revision of a time-honored creed. Should this be done, it may be that for many years no opportunity will be presented for this great body to freely discuss a feasible basis of the union of Protestantism. It is true, too, that the religious world is made expectant and open to general discussion of this great question by the position of the revisionists. Public attention is directed toward the subject of the true creed of the church, which should be sought for and adopted.

In the light of the foregoing, is not the time propitious for a movement, among all evangelical Protestants, that shall accomplish the desired end? It might not prove successful, but even then the cause for which the Master prayed would be advanced by the agitation. If successful, the progress of the Church of Christ would doubtless be beyond our present fondest hopes.

To this end let me suggest:

1. That the president of the American Christian Missionary Society, upon receiving expression of a favorable sentiment from leading men of our brotherhood, appoint a committee of seven.

2. That this committee present an address to the various Protestant bodies, setting forth the desirability of a closer affiliation of the Lord's people, and outlining a general plan for a United Prostestant Congress; this congress to be representative of the various religious bodies interested at the ratio of one delegate to each 100,000 adherents; this congress to consider the feasibility of unity, to seek for a scriptural co-operation of all Churches of Christ, to recommend to all Protestant bodies of worhipers the adoption of the divine method of unity.

This would present an opportunity for the discussion of this great question. The leading men of all parties might freely express their convictions, and present what they understand to be the scriptural basis of unity. It is a well-known fact that the great scholars of the world stand almost united in their conceptions of the fundamental teachings of the word of God. The time seems ripe for all such to stand forth and for the sake of our King and his Church to seek to further the answering of his prayer "that they all may be one." JOHN RHODES.

NO MAN IS STRONGER THAN HIS STOMACH.

The stomach is the vital center of the body. It is the organ from which all other organs are fed. A weak stomach means a weak man. There never was a strong man with a weak stomach. What is called "weak stomach" is in general a diseased condition of the stomach and other organs of digestion and nutrition, which prevents the proper digestion of the food which is taken into the stomach, and so reduces the nutrition of the body. When all food is taken away the body starves. When the food eaten is only digested and assimilated in part it only nourishes the body in part, and so the body is partly starved. And this starvation is felt in every organ of the body dependent on the blood which is made from food.

The great variety of the cures performed by Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is due to its remarkable power to heal diseases of the stomach and allied organs. It cures through the stomach diseases seemingly remote, but which have their origin in a diseased condition of the stomach and the other organs of digestion and nutrition. "Weak" heart, lungs, kidneys and weakness of other organs is cured with the cure of the weak stomach.

Mr. Thomas A. Swarts, Box 103, Sub-Station C., Columbus, Ohio, writes: "I was taken very sick with severe headache, then cramps in the stomach, and food would not digest, then kidney and liver trouble, and my back got weak so I could scarcely get around. The more I doctored the worse I got until six years passed. I had become so poorly I could only walk in the house by the aid of a chair, and I got so thin I had given up to die, thinking that I could not be cured. Then one of my neighbors said, 'Take Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and make a new man out of yourself.' The first bottle helped me so I thought I would get another, and after I had taken eight bottles I was weighed and found I had gained twenty-seven (27) lbs. in about six weeks. I have done more hard work in the past eleven months than I did in two years before, and I am as stout and healthy to-day, I think, as I ever was."

Concerning the Lord's Supper.

Is it within the limits of Christian liberty to observe the Lord's supper on other than the Lord's day? This question is asked by "a learner" and answered by an editor in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of January 31. I think the editor is in error. My opinion is that he has not voiced the sentiment of the people who are giving themselves to the effort to restore Apostolic Christianity. I think ninety-eight of every hundred would condemn his position.

This matter may be easily, quickly and rightly decided in the light of the purpose or object of the Lord's supper.

For what was it given to us?

Why do we do this?

Is it necessary for us to say, we can not add any new purpose? If we can not none could since its giving.

Among us it is a recognized fact that the religionists of our time do not know the purpose of it.

The priest in the Catholic Church "administers" it to the dying man to prepare him for dying. Not in memory of Jesus. Not to show the death of Jesus. Something of this mediæval idea clings to our editor who to a sick person would "administer" the institution. The thoughts of "priest," "administering," "eucharist," "sacrament," etc., are of a kind. He who has the impression that a sick man may be benefited by having the Lord's supper "administered" to him, gets his impression from Roman Catholicism, not from the Bible. This is the foundation of this whole matter of "administering" it to the sick. In addition to this the Roman Catholic has made a high mass or low mass of it, to be celebrated with more or less pomp and ceremony on funeral occasions; high mass for the high or rich and great, and low mass for the poor and small and obscure.

The Episcopalian follows closely, "elevating the host," celebrating the "eucharist" several times in a day and at off times without a thought of the scriptural idea of the Lord's supper.

The M. E. Church follows after with her closer than Baptist close communion, in which a preacher's wife can not commune with her husband for the reason that the ministers—priests, reverends— are a separate class above the common people. The clergy above the laity. And, then it requires a reverend to "administer" it to the laity, and this is done once a quarter because the Discipline says do it.

Do these people know that Jesus said "do this in memory of me"? "As oft as you eat this bread and drink this cup you do show the Lord's death till he come." They do not know the purpose of it.

Our Baptist brethren don't know what it is for. If they did they would not say to those who in love and loyalty to Christ wish to do this in his memory, "You shall not do this here at our table."

Thousands of the followers of Jesus, and many of them are found in our ranks, have received from that old Catholic and Episcopal idea, the thought of the Lord's supper as a "sacrament," or "the eucharist," and that it is something so severely sacred and holy that only the very religious are "worthy to partake of it."

This is as great a mistake as to think it is to be "administered" to a sick man to prepare him for dying.

The Lord's supper is a memorial, a monument. It was given for a purpose, one purpose. "Do this in remembrance of me," said Jesus. "As often as you eat this bread, and drink this cup you do show the Lord's death till he come," said Paul the inspired, who received his knowledge of it from the Lord. When and where is this monument erected? Where does it stand that men may see it and be shown the Lord's death?

The editor says: "Let us say first of all that we believe the custom, well established among us, of observing the Lord's supper on each first day of the week, has the sanction of the early church after it had settled down to its normal life, and that there is a fitness in associating this institution with the day observed in memory of Christ's resurrection, the Lord's day." Amen.

Now leave it where we find it in the "normal life" of the church divinely guided, and never allow any post-apostolic church or teaching to mar its beauty or destroy its design.

If the Lord's supper was instituted to show the Lord's death, and if the early church, Spirit-guided, established the time of its observance, then that settles it, and he is unwise, if not presumptuous, who would "do this" at other times and for other purposes.

And if this be true, what the editor has said about its being instituted on Thursday, and about the first church's doing it daily before the church had "settled down to its normal life," and about the probability or possibility that Paul at Troas did it on Monday, is wholly gratuitous and of no force.

The record says, "And upon the first day of the week when the disciples came together to break bread."

It is not "within the limits of Christian liberty" to make changes in the Lord's plans.

Marion, Ind. E. L. FRAZIER.

[In giving the foregoing to our readers we regret that the writer did not direct his remarks to the real issue involved instead of making the excursus into matters which have no bearing on the point before us. Whether our opinion "voiced the sentiment" of the brotherhood, or whether "ninety-eight of every hundred would condemn" our position, were questions that did not occur to us in seeking for the truth on the matter in hand.

The writer starts off as if he were coming right to the point. "This matter," he says, "may be easily, quickly and rightly decided in the light of the purpose or object of the Lord's supper." After a long preamble into the Catholic and Episcopal Churches, he comes to what the purpose is: "The Lord's supper is a memorial, a monument. It was given for a purpose, one purpose: 'Do this in remembrance of me.'" Of course, then, the inference is that the Lord's supper cannot be partaken of in memory of Christ on any other day of the week than the first. Otherwise the argument is inconsequential. This being the case, the apostles and first Christians at Jerusalem who observed the Lord's supper daily, did not do it in memory of their recently risen Lord. Nor was the institution observed in memory of Christ by the Christians of the first centuries, who, according to the most reliable church history, sometimes observed it on other days of the week than the Lord's day. Even Paul and the church at Troas, who, in all probability, observed the Lord's supper on Monday morning, did not do it in memory of Christ! Is this not dealing in rather a high-handed manner with apostolic authority and example?

The writer quotes what we said in approval of our custom of observing the Lord's supper on the first day of the week as sanctioned by the example of the early church and adds: "Now leave it where we find it in the 'normal life' of the church divinely guided." Well, we certainly did not propose to take the institution out of the first day of the week, but to let it remain there, as the established custom of the churches. But our critic adds: "If the Lord's supper was instituted to show the Lord's death, and if the early church, Spirit-guided, established the time of its observance, then that settles it, and he is unwise if not presumptuous who would do this at other times and for other purposes." The phrase, "and for other purposes" should not have been added. It has no relevancy to this controversy. It is not a question of changing the purpose. It is only a question of whether it is impossible for that purpose to be served on any other day than Lord's day. Let us see if our brother is willing to abide by the rule he has laid down in the foregoing. In 1 Cor. 16:2, Paul says: "Upon the first day of the week let each one of you lay by him in store as he may be prospered that no collection may be made when I come." The custom has become universal of taking the collection on the first day of the week, and the above passage shows that it became the custom of the early church when it had settled down into its "normal life." But are we prohibited by that scripture, and by the custom of the early church, from taking an offering on any other day in the week except the Lord's day? Our brother would hardly so argue. Is it not clear that the Lord's supper was observed and the collections taken on the first day of the week because that was the day on which the disciples met for worship and they met on that day because of Christ's resurrection from the dead on the first day of the week?

Our brother's conclusion is that, "It is not within the limits of Christian liberty to make changes in the Lord's plans." That, of course, is assuming the point at issue. What he means is that "it is not within the limits of Christian liberty" to observe the Lord's supper on any other day than the first day of the week. Then the church at Jerusalem, under apostolic guidance, and the church at Troas with Paul as the preacher, went beyond the limits of Christian liberty. Their action was "unwise, not to say presumptuous." A view which thus discounts the force of apostolic example is not likely to find favor with "ninety-eight per cent." of those who are set for the defense of apostolic Christianity, a prime article of which was "to stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free."—EDITOR]

California Notes.

The Bay District convention at San Jose is thought to have been the best we ever had. We met, not only to talk, but to put things in shape for something to be done.

The Central Church gave us a royal welcome. Bro. Sapp, the minister, had things in fine shape. The "hand-maids" of the church, the C. W. B. M., S. S. and C. E., were represented by good papers. Bro. E. T. Nesbit, the district evangelist, had been doing a good work at Salinas, near the great sugar mill.

Dean Van Kirk and Prof. Elston, of the Berkeley Bible Seminary, gave such addresses as their culture and knowledge would furnish. They are the right men in the right place.

The Bible Seminary is gaining ground in the ranks of the university workers and students and the dean's lectures are well attended.

A new building is about to be erected at Palo Alto, in the shadow of Stanford University. We have a live congregation there, and Bro. D. A. Russell has been the preacher there for three years. We expect to build a church at Berkeley not many months hence, so that our work will be known and read at both the great universities. Bro. Elston administers the word to the people at Berkeley in Stile's hall for the present.

Bro. J. W. Ingram was in the midst of a fine meeting at Santa Cruz, with a number of additions, when he took sick. Bro. Ingram has been called to the Alameda church, one to the best locations in California, and will begin March 1. Bro. A. R. Hathaway, from Alameda, goes to Santa Clara, a suburban city to San Jose. The First Day Adventists and our church had a nuptial feast not many years ago. They united and the Advent house was moved, joined on to the old like a T. They all possessed the spirit of the Master and general prosperity has perched upon their banners.

It is expected that Bro. Sumner T. Martin will be the city evangelist for San Francisco and the cities contiguous to the bay. He will be warmly welcomed to the "Golden Gate."

Bro. T. A. Boyer has been loosed from his Stockton moorings by the Pacific Coast Lecture Bureau. His eloquence has placed him with Dr. Jordan, of Stanford, and Benj. Ide Wheeler, of the University of California.

Bro. McHatton has done a good work at Santa Cruz. He stayed with the little church till they had a good house finished. He now resigns and goes east of the Rockies to evangelize.

Bro. J. H. Hughes, of Chico, goes to an Ohio church. We will do our level best to get on without these able brethren. We think they will soon be longing for the garnered sweetness of the fig, the luscious apricot and peach, the golden oranges and endless flowers, and will soon be swinging about the "Golden Gate."

Bro. and Sister Hazen, two of our good young preachers, have been called to the First Church, San Jose, in place of Bro. Burton, who will enter the general field as evangelist.

Our veteran, Bro. Wilmot, organized a church at Vallejo about two years ago and every department is in a prosperous condition.

Bro. J. C. Williams seems to be a fixture at Winters.

Anyone who knows Bro. T. D. Butler and Bro. W. F. Reagor, knows that Willows and Colusa are gaining strength on every hand. These brethren have a large field, in fact more than they can occupy. Bro. Powers, of Butte City, is the only preacher very near them, and Bro. Powers has a large diocese as well.

Bro. Bonnell, our evangelist of Sonoma District, will probably have to work in the Sacramento District. No one can be found to do the work better. Bro. Shadle, in the San Joaquin District, has more calls than he can meet. Each of these districts is larger than two or three of the New England states.

Bro. Murphy, now of Geyserville, reports advance movements, and Bro. Dixon is holding the fort at Healdsburg bravely and his work prospers, while Bro. Colvin is so entrenched at Santa Rosa that the enemy trembles at his power and the people obey the gospel.

Bro. J. S. Pierce at Upper Lake and Bro. Dargitz at Lake Port are all the preachers we have in Lake county, but these brethren are in the front of the battle and their fields are well managed.

It appears now that California is to lead the country in oil as well as gold and quicksilver. Oil is found in almost every direction, but every investment will not pay a fortune.

Spring is opening upon us and the "almond tree flourisheth."

Bro. Ford, of the First Church in San Francisco, and Bro W. M. White, of the West Side Church, are making their influence felt in that great metropolis. Scarcely a week passes without additions. The city evangelist will find these brethren most noble yokefellows.

Bro J. J. White has returned from his visit to his Ohio home and will take charge of the Sacramento church.

Bro. and Sister McKeever are greatly beloved by the Fresno church. They will have Bro. W. H. Martin, who has retired to his raisin farm, to second every good movement set on foot.

Bro. and Sister Johnson, who came to us from the Methodists, are both good preachers and are in the golden hills and orange groves of Oroville, in a fine meeting.

The churches at Lodi and Acampo are keeping Bro. Shopshire busy, as they are three miles apart and he is at both prayer-meetings. But he is still limping along a single man.

A general forward movement all along the Pacific slope, through California, Oregon and Washington. Our State Board wants to meet all the pressing calls, but it is impossible, hence several independent evangelists are doing more or less work.

J. DURHAM.

To District and County Boards.

O. P. Shrout, Kansas City, R. H. Fife, Weston and myself have been appointed a corresponding committee for Missouri, by our Foreign Christian Missionary Society. We have undertaken to try to help the work of keeping our Missouri brotherhood in touch with that great department. Bro. Fife and Bro. Shrout have in hand the keeping of corrected lists of our new churches, ministers, Sunday-schools and Christian Endeavor Societies, etc. I will have charge of seeing, as far as possible, that addresses on foreign missions are made at all of our state, district and county conventions. Will brethren and sisters who have the arranging of programs for such conventions please make places on all such programs for addresses on this subject, and write me to that effect? If you have difficulty in arranging for speakers, let me know and I will do what I can to help you to secure them. I would be especially glad to have the dates and places of all conventions of our people to be held in Missouri this spring or summer. By systematic attention to a few of these matters we can greatly advance the cause of world-wide missions. Correspond with Bros. Fife and Shrout on the part of the work in their hands, as above. Let me hear from you. J. H. HARDIN.

Willis, a specialist, of Crawfordsville, Ind., will send free by mail to all who send him their address, a package of Pansy Compound, which is two weeks' treatment with printed instructions, and is a positive cure for constipation, biliousness, dyspepsia, rheumatism, neuralgia, nervous or sick headache, la grippe and blood poison.

The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful it Is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines, and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking, or after eating onions or other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion; it whitens the teeth; and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics, in tablet form, or rather in the form of large, pleasant-tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood; and the beauty of it is that no harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

All Competition Distanced.

The fast trains of the Union Pacific reach San Francisco fifteen hours ahead of all competitors. If you are in no hurry take a slow train by one of the detour routes, but if you want to get there without suffering any of the inconveniences of winter travel, take the only direct route, the UNION PACIFIC.

Missouri Missions.

The new venture of the board in the employment of more men for the needy field is calling forth the very highest commendation from brethren in various parts of the state. Many preachers have written to us and given hearty commendations of the work of enlargement. Not only so, but from other sources as well have come highest congratulations, especially on the high character of the men employed. The Louisiana Press, published in Louisiana, where Bro. Lampton preached for seven years, by Bro. I. N. Bryson, in mentioning the engagement of Bro. Lampton as state evangelist, gives him the highest commendations and congratulates the board on his employment.

In regard to Bro. Popplewell, I have received the following letter, which was inspired by seeing the notice of his employment in the papers. It is dated Midford, Okla., and says:

"DEAR BROTHER ABBOTT:—I have learned that you are employing Bro. Thomas H. Popplewell in the Southeastern district in Missouri. That is a very wise move on the part of the Mission Board. Bro. Popplewell is one of our ablest and most earnest men. He is one of the most thorough men among us. A logical and clear defender of our plea, and up-to-date in all our work. He is, if necessary, a good debater, and can meet any man who assails our position. The writer has known him ever since he began to travel and preach, and feels assured that his work in his new field will be good one both for himself and the brethren in Missouri.

Yours fraternally,
H. R. WALLING."

Such words make us feel that we are carrying out the will of the brethren in Missouri. Some of them are accompanying their words of commendation with that which shows they are in earnest, the apportionment in full and, in many cases, something over, and that is the very best endorsement one can give. We have sent over 200 postal cards to preachers whose churches have not yet responded to the call for State Mission collection, and the replies are now coming in. Nearly all of them have some very good excuse for not having yet lifted the collection, and express the determination to raise it later on. The difficulty is, that the secretary was uninformed as to the reason and was left in doubt.

We spent last Sunday morning at Laddonia, and never were more happily received. They have one of the best working Bible-schools in the state, and that means a great church. J. C. De Laporte is the superintendent, and he has a fine corps of teachers. Evening found me at Louisiana, and I sure enjoyed being back among home folks. Bro. Mayhall is taking hold splendidly, and the church is giving him generous support. The next night I was in old Corinth neighborhood, my first church. B. G. Reaves, of Canton, is their preacher, and he is a first-class one, too. The next night was spent at Jefferson City, where I was made to rejoice in the good work of Bro. Pinkerton. The reports from every part of the field are full of encouragement. No sign of defeat anywhere, but the church is moving to the watchword: "Speak to the children of Israel, that they move forward."

Yours in His name,
T. A. ABBOTT.

Alexander Campbell's Theology

By W. E. GARRISON. This book is a scientific statement according to the historical method of the religious and philosophical influences which molded the theological teaching of Mr. Campbell. Here are some extracts from reviews:

J. J. HALEY: "This book marks the beginning of a new epoch in our literature. . . . . I heartily commend it to the perusal of thoughtful men and women."

F. D. POWER: "A distinct and noteworthy contribution to our literature. It is a clear and comprehensive statement of a very important theme."

ERI B. HULBERT: "Readers whose desire it is to understand the theology which Mr. Campbell elaborated will find in this treatise exactly the information they are seeking."

Special dispatch to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., Feb. 18.—Four hundred and twenty-seven additions in Dayton, O., meeting. We are continuing. Thirteen hundred and forty-two added in our first year's work as a team. We all rejoice.

WILSON & HUSTON.

Fayetteville, Ark., Feb. 16.—There were three additions to the First Church on last Sunday; two by letter and one conversion.—N. M. RAGLAND.

Little Rock, Ark.—We had planned for a great meeting to begin Jan. 6. Prof. C. E. Millard was to help with the music. He was on hand when the day arrived but the writer was down with the grippe. Bro. W. J. Hudspeth, chaplain of the penitentiary, was asked to preach until the pastor was able to take up the work. He and Bro. Millard worked together with good result for one week when the pastor took charge, but was able to preach only four days when he was compelled to take to his bed again, and the meeting closed. But it was a good meeting in spite of la grippe, and a number were added to the church. Seven have been added since. I intend to preach next Sunday an ante-election sermon on "The Lawlessness of Law Officers."—J. N. JESSUP.

Clay City, Ill., Feb. 11.—The first week of meeting here closed yesterday with three confessions. Fine attendance and interest. The singing by the large chorus is good. Our next meeting is at Fairfield, Ill. Write at once for dates.—C. M. HUGHES, gospel singer.

Clinton, Ill., Feb. 18.—Two confessions yesterday, 19 in regular services since Jan. 1.—E. A. GILLILAND.

Concord, Ill., Feb. 11.—The meeting at this place commenced Jan. 27th. Twelve additions up to Feb. 10. Large audiences and fine interest. Bro. J. W. Camp, the pastor, is doing the preaching. This church has been greatly strengthened and encouraged by the good and faithful work of the pastor.—LULA E. HENDERSON.

Cowden, Ill., Feb. 18.—R. Leland Brown, state evangelist for the sixth district, has just closed the greatest revival ever held in this little city. Thirty-six names have been added to our church roll, between the ages of 17 and 73. All married except four. Twenty-six by baptism.—M. E. STEELE, clerk.

Decatur, Ill., Feb. 12.—We have had eight more additions since my last report, two last Lord's day and two last night in our meeting conducted by the writer. We have had additions every Sunday for nine consecutive weeks. I have 52 in my Sunday-school class. Mrs. Coggins organized an intermediate C. E. Society last Lord's day with 25 members. Our present church membership is 790. I expect to hold an all the year round revival.—J. C. COGGINS.

Girard, Ill., Feb. 11.—Our meeting of 28 days just closed. Bro. A. A. Wilson, of Mattoon, did nearly all the preaching. Result, 30 baptized and eight received by relation and reclaimed. A number were received from the Dunkard church and were baptized. The Girard church has just completed and almost paid for a new house costing $5,000. Every department of the work is in good condition.—E. O. SHARPE.

Hower Hill, Ill., Feb. 18.—Fifteen additions to date. House packed and many turned away last night.—WM. DRUMMET.

Jacksonville, Ill., Feb. 18.—Seven have been added to the church here during the last three Lord's days. With one exception all are by confession or from the denominations. Bro. Snively preaches to crowded houses at every service.—WALLACE BROCKMAN.

Sullivan, Ill., Feb. 11.—Two added here yesterday one by statement, one by baptism. Our C. E. Society is steadily on the upgrade; our prayer-meetings also. The outlook is very encouraging.—EDWIN E. CURRY.

Tower Hill, Ill., Feb. 11.—Meeting well begun. House packed to the rostrum last night. Four additions yesterday. The brethren here have recently dedicated a new house of worship and are in good spirits.—WM. DRUMMET.

Watseka, Ill., Feb. 11.—In a conspicuous place over the pulpit hangs the motto we have chosen for the year, viz.: "1901—A SOUL SAVING YEAR." And it is proving to be true. The son of our Co. Y. M. C. A. Sec., united with the church at our regular prayer-meeting recently. Four persons at our mission station responded to the gospel invitation and four more here, and one was added by letter, making 10 in the last few days.—B. S. FERRALL, pastor.

Watseka, Ill., Feb. 18.—Another confession as a result of our work here yesterday. Eight were baptized at the prayer-meeting service last week. I should like to have our evangelists all over the United States know that at almost every one of our regular prayer-meetings their work is lifted to God in fervent prayer. These hard-working worthy servants are not forgotten by this people. God bless them!—B. S. FERRALL.

Brazil, Ind., Feb. 11.—We are in a fine meeting in Brazil. Ninety-four added the first 15 days, all confessions but 11. Two hundred and seventy-seven in the Sunday-school yesterday with a $6.87 collection.—GEO. A. WEBB, singing evangelist.

Delphi, Ind., Feb. 9.—We have had six confessions since January report, as the result of special effort to win our Sunday-school pupils to Christ.—WM. GRANT SMITH.

Marion, Ind., Feb. 11.—The Central Church at this place is in a healthful condition. Our present pastor, we feel, is doing much toward maintaining this state of affairs. Twenty-two have been added since he began Oct. 14, 1900. The cause is looking upward in this city.—R. H. SMITH.

Muncie, Ind., Feb. 16.—Our meeting here is two weeks old. There have been 10 additions. I am doing the preaching. J. Walter Wilson is song leader. He is a great singer. His solo work is especially fine. Bro. E. L. Powell, of Louisville, Ky., will be with me Monday for 10 days.—J. H. MACNEILL.

Thorntown, Ind., Feb. 11.—J. H. Stotler, of Mt. Carmel, Ill., assisted us in a meeting here. Closed last night with 10 accessions. The church was strengthened by the meeting and we press forward for greater things in the future. I go to-day to help Bro. Stotler in a meeting at Mt. Carmel.—LEE TINSLEY, pastor.

Audubon, Iowa.—A splendid meeting here, J. H. McSparran, pastor, and A. B. Moore evangelist, has just closed with 25 additions. When Bro. McSparran took this work in 1899 the congregation felt in almost a hopeless condition and had no church home. Now it has a property including parsonage, lot and house of worship worth nearly $5,000, the best location in town and over 100 members. He closes his work there next month.

Brandon, Iowa, Feb. 11.—At our appointment at Prairie Creek yesterday morning two were added by letter from the M. E. Church, and in the evening one by confession.—SAM B. ROSS.

BLEEDING PILES

And All Other Forms of this Common and Annoying Disease, Cured by the Pyramid Pile Cure.

Thousands of men and women suffer from some form of piles without either knowing the exact nature of the trouble, or knowing it, carelessly allow it to run without using the simple means of a radical cure.

The failure of salves and ointments to cure piles has led many sufferers to believe the only permanent cure to be a surgical operation, but surgical operations are dangerous to life and moreover very expensive and by no means always or even often successful.

The safest and surest way to cure any case of piles, whether itching, protruding or bleeding, is to use the Pyramid Pile Cure, composed of healing vegetable oils, and absolutely free from mineral poisons and opiates.

Mr. Wm. Handschu of Pittsburg, Pa., after suffering severely from bleeding piles, writes as follows:

"I take pleasure writing these few lines to let you know that I did not sleep for three months except for a short time each night because of a bad case of bleeding piles. I was down in bed and doctors did me no good.

"A good brother told me of the Pyramid Pile Cure and I bought from my druggist three fifty-cent boxes. They completely cured me and I will soon be able to go to my work again."

The Pyramid Pile Cure is not only the safest and surest pile remedy but it is by far the widest known and most popular, because so many thousands have tried it and found it exactly as represented.

Every physician and druggist in the country knows the Pyramid Pile Cure and what it will do.

Send to Pyramid Drug Co., Marshall, Mich., for little book on Cause and Cure of Piles mailed free to any address or better yet get a fifty-cent box of the remedy itself at the nearest drug store and try it tonight.

We expect to bombard this sectarian and infidel stronghold for two weeks more, then go to Centralia, Ill. Brethren, we need your prayers very much just now.—BEN F. HILL & GUY B. WILLIAM-SON.

Memphis, Neb., Feb. 11.—Evangelist H. A. Lemon is holding a good meeting at the Plainview church four miles north of Mem-phis. Large attendance, good interest and 15 additions; 10 by baptism, 5 reclaimed; meet-ing two weeks old.—THOS. A. MAXWELL, pas-tor.

Omaha, Neb., Feb. 12.—Yesterday there were three additions to our membership mak-ing 110 in the ten months of my ministry here. Our C. E. Society is far the largest and most active in the city, having now very close to 100 members. There were 31 a year ago. Four young men and a young woman united with the Endeavor last evening. We are laying plans to wipe out the entire indebtedness of the church—mortgage and floating. It is believed that the latter will be cleared up within the next month, and the other by the end of the year. We have just had a canvass of Omaha and South Omaha for the CHRIS-TIAN EVANGELIST which resulted in over 150 new subscribers being secured, half of them among the families connected with the First Church. The debate on Mormonism between D. H. Bays, of Iowa, for the Disciples of Christ and Herman Smith for the Mormons, has been in progress since Feb. 4, each night in the North Side Church. A full house is pres-ent each evening but there is little general interest. I think both sides are satisfied with their respective champions. We are planning for a great meeting with one of our greatest evangelists to begin some time next month. We confidently expect 200 or 300 additions to result from this meeting. As far as I can learn no really great meeting has ever been held here by the Disciples. We must have one this spring. Keep your eye this way.—SUM-NER T. MARTIN.

Akron, O., Feb. 11.—Our meeting at the High Street Church of Christ closed with 51 additions. Bro. J. E. Hawes, of Ada, O., led the song service.—J. G. SLAYTER.

Birthright.

You pelt me for barbarian,
  Little son of Italy;
Your laughing sister cries you on,
  Mischief-dancing prettily.
    Yet, to your cerulean sky
    Which more native, you or I?

You peasant, in your stage-land cloak,
  Turning out so charily
To let me pass, below your brow
  Though you eye me warily,
    To your cypress-pillared sky
    Which more native, you or I?

My scornful goatherd—while your flock
  Clips the young flowers fragrantly—
Up the long hill to Tusculum
  Loitering, singing vagrantly,
    Where that green path meets the sky
    Which has birthright, you or I?

You will but sit and take the sun
  On the warm stones prosily;
For me will come old dreams, old loves,
  Old Pan, piping dozily.
    Ah, to this memorial sky
    Which more native, you or I?

A Kind Life.

By Elizabeth Flower Willis.

"Ah, girl-queen, seated on the throne
  Which youth and beauty claim as dower,
  Seekest thou some secret word of power,
Which shall make every heart thine own?
  In this one word the answer find,
    Be kind!"

The word "kindness" means so much. We give it little thought, for we hear it so often. In its broadest, truest sense it means thought for others, helpful encouragement, bright hopefulness and cheering faith for the good of those about us. The great souls of earth have been, and still are, the kind lives. Every one can be kind. True it is that "kindness is the bond of friendship and the hook of love."

Dean Stanley says, "Every kindness done others is a step nearer to the life of Christ."

Few lives have such a halo around their brows for kindness done others as we see reflected from the life of the sweet-souled Quaker woman, whose life began in a quiet country home in Nantucket more than one hundred years ago. When Lucretia was twelve years of age the family moved to Boston. At first the father, Capt. Coffin, sent his children to a private school, but afterwards, fearing this would make them proud, removed them to a public school so they would be thrown with all classes. In later years Lucretia said, "I am glad, because it gave me sympathy for the patient, struggling poor, which, but for this experience, I might never have understood."

Lucretia Mott,

At the age of eighteen she was united in marriage with James Mott, a successful school teacher, afterwards engaged in the cotton, then the wool business. In every phase of life Mrs. Lucretia Mott was kindness itself. Her greatest thought and interest was in human nature and human needs.

Always most deeply interested in the slave, it was not surprising that she was chosen president of the Female Anti-Slavery Society, as soon as it was formed in Philadelphia, and from the first she was the society's inspiration.

Years of martyrdom followed, and anti-slavery lecturers were often tarred and feathered. At one time an anti-slavery meeting held in New York City was broken up by a mob who began ill-treating the speaker. The ladies in the audience were frightened. Mrs. Mott immediately turned to a gentleman near her and said, "Won't thee look after those ladies?"

"Who will take care of you?" he asked, looking around for a moment.

With a sweet smile covering her face she said with kind voice, "This man," as she laid her hand on the arm of the roughest of the mob. "I know he will see me safely through." Most respectfully did the leader of the disturbance escort her to a place of safety.

All through her life-work as the lovely "Quaker preacher," the woman speaker on total abstinence, the anti-slavery lecturer, a woman who was living for the elevation and happiness of all races, she realized in her great work that few could be driven, while most people could be won and led by kindness.

Their large house was a home for the poor, the sick, the slave. In the broad hall of their home were two arm chairs which the children called "beggars'" chairs, because they were constantly used by those who "waited to see the missns." Never did Mrs. Mott refuse to see anybody. Although she had plenty of help at her command, she would often stand for hours preparing extra pies, puddings and meats for the hungry. We often see that those women whose lives are crowded with outside interests are the best housekeepers.

At the age of sixty-three Mrs. Mott had been seen and loved by thousands for forty years. Often would she be stopped on the street by strangers who would say, "God bless you, Lucretia Mott!"

A slave was being tried for running away, Mrs. Mott's son-in-law, Mr. Hopper, defending the accused. The opposing counsel asked that Mrs. Mott's chair be moved so she would not face the jury, as they would be influenced against him if they looked into her face.

When about seventy years of age, this benevolent woman's health demanded a change from her home. This caused heart sorrows and moanings among all her friends, largely of the poorer class. The following is the end of a poem that was read before leaving:

"Who constantly will ring the bell,
And ask if they will please to tell
Where Mrs. Mott has gone to dwell?
  The beggars.

"And who persistently will say,
We cannot, cannot go away;
Here in the entry let us stay?
  Colored beggars.

"Who never, never, nevermore
Will see the 'lions' at the door,
That they've so often seen before?
  The neighbors.

"And who will miss, for months at least,
That place of rest for man and beast,
From north and south, from west and east?
  Everybody."

When a person is so considerate and kind to others they will always be loved.

One cold, rainy day in Philadelphia Mrs. Mott entered a street car. Seeing a poorly dressed colored woman standing on the outside in the rain, she asked the conductor to let her in the car. "Can't do it," said the conductor. "The company's orders must be obeyed." Then the frail little lady of seventy years stepped upon the outside platform. The conductor knew it would never do to allow Mrs. Mott to stand in the rain, so he entreated her to come inside. "Not without this woman," was the reply. "Oh, well; bring her in, then!" Soon the company's orders were changed in the interests of humanity.

She lived to see the slave freed, and at the age of eighty-five was speaking in great meetings. When Christmas came she never failed to take turkeys, pies and some present for each one at the Home for Aged Colored People in Philadelphia. When her long life of kindness and usefulness was ended, and the time came for the last words to be said, scarcely a person could speak—their voices choked, and as they stood silently around the open grave a low voice said, "Will no one say anything?" Another responded, "Who can speak? Our preacher is dead"—she was so kind to all.

"Think kindly and do kindly all the day;
Be useful where thou livest, that they may
Both want and wish thy helpful presence here.
All worldly joys are less Than the one joy of doing kindnesses."

The cheerful greetings, small courtesies, unselfish acts, little kindnesses, bring to us the real sunshine of life.

No Nibbler.

An Old Fish Knows Good Bait From Poor.

A good old family doctor down in Edenburg, Miss., says he is not afraid to tell the truth about coffee and its effect on him and the remarkable change produced by leaving off and taking Postum Food Coffee in its place.

He used coffee for many years, and says: "Of late years I have been so nervous that I dreaded to perform an operation, and my eyesight had bothered me a considerable. I think about two years ago I first heard of Postum Food Coffee, and gave it a trial. I am not quick to bite at humbugs, but the change in my physical condition brought about by leaving off coffee and taking Postum Food Coffee was a complete surprise. I began to eat well, sleep well, and in just three months my eyesight was restored, my nerves strong, headaches disappeared, and my chronic catarrh of thirteen years standing was cured with little or no treatment except the change in coffee.

I am to-day stout, erect, and weigh 20 pounds more than I did before giving up coffee. I have an extensive practice and have had very satisfactory results among my patients where I have induced them to leave off coffee and take Postum in its place.

Coffee is ruining and destroying thousands of our young Americans, and it is a pleasure to know of a nutritious and palatable breakfast beverage that rebuilds the nervous system rather than tears it down, as the old coffee does.

It may interest you to know that we had much the same experience as many others when we first began to prepare Postum. We boiled it in a desultory sort of way for a few minutes and the product was not satisfactory. Turning to the directions we discovered the fault and from that time we have followed those directions, which are simple enough, with the most satisfactory results in point of flavor and food value.

With my best wishes for your continued success." DR. A. G. ALSTON.

Three Weeks' Supplies.

The land-looker was waiting for the team that was to transport him and his partner, with their packs, six miles down the shore of Lake Superior, where the trail struck north through the pine timber. The liveryman had gone to catch the horses, for the land breeze had blown the flies into town, and the stock had taken to the brush.

"And do you carry all that on your back?" asked the young lady, who had never seen a land-looker before. She pointed to the fat pack that lay on the hotel porch.

"That ain't much of a load, miss," said the land-looker. "Not more'n sixty pounds. My partner goes me ten to twenty better. He's younger'n I be."

"My!" said the young lady, and tried to lift the pack. "What's in it—ore specimens?"

"Grub mostly, miss."

"Sixty pounds of grub!" cried the young lady.

"Three weeks' supplies, miss," said the land-looker. "Seems a hull lot, don't it? I lost a pack like that in the woods once, an' half a week's work with it."

"I suppose it slipped off and you didn't notice it," said the young lady. The land-looker smiled appreciatively, and filled his pipe.

"It was while I was up on Kimball Crick last fall," said he. "It's up the same trail we're going to-day. Pretty hard jaunt—two miles of it straight up hill from the lake, and a darned poor trail. When I got to Bailey's shanty I was right tuckered.

"The shanty was empty. Bailey died a spell before from eatin' raw grub. He was too busy workin' his claim to cook, 'cordin' to the obituaries.

"It was no great shakes—the shanty; hardly taller'n I be, an' well ventilated; but the 'scoop' roof was water-tight, an' there was a feather-mattress in one room. There's more poetry, miss, in a bed of balsam boughs; but poetry and land-lookin' are sep'rate propositions.

"The first thing was to yank a few trouts outer the crick an' get 'em into the fryin'-pan; an' while they was turnin' up their edges, an' the coffee was b'ilin', I emptied my pack an' put the grub on the shelves in the shanty. I had a number of 'forties' to look over round there, an' I figgered on stayin' in camp three or four days.

"As I was comin' out of the shanty to turn the fish I seen a big black bear meanderin' up through the grass from the crick. Men in my line, miss, don't carry guns. But I hev a yell of larger caliber and great penetration, an' I threw it at the bear. He came right along. I chucked a piece of birchwood after the yell, and then I backed into the shanty.

"The bear cuffed the fryin'-pan off'n the fire, an' while he was chawin' up the fish I barred the door, slipped out a side winder, lettin' the sash fall behind me, an' started on a run down the trail, to borrer a rifle of a homesteader I chinned with on the way up.

"It was something more'n a mile, but I made good time, coming back faster. I was mad and hungry. When I got to the clearin' there wasn't any bear, an' I was thrashin' roun' for his tracks when I heard a rattle of tinware in the shanty. The creature had gotten in by cuffin' off one end of the 'scoop' roof.

"'Come outer there, you black thief!' said I, poundin' on the door. He come in a hurry, an' I got back for a shot; but when he stuck his head through the hole in the roof I most shouted. A black bear had went in, an' a white one was comin' out.

"All of a sudden I tumbled to the truth, an' I cussed an' fired at the same time.

"The inside of the shanty was a wreck. I 'most wept when I looked at it. That bear'd chawed or pawed over all my supplies. He'd ripped open the sack of flour and rolled in it till the critter looked like a polar bear. He was dead as a door-nail, but he looked happy.

"I eat bear-steak for supper, without bread or butter, an' coffee—what I could scrape up—without sugar. Next mornin' I started back to town for another three weeks' supplies."

"How interesting!" said the young lady. And just then the liveryman came with the horses and a million horse-flies.—Woman's Home Companion.

Afraid of Being Fined.

The story is told of a drunken man who fell asleep by the roadside at Delagoa Bay. A patrol coming along, thought he was dead, and, as burial in that part of the world follows straight upon the heels of death, he was speedily taken to the cemetery, where there are always some open graves. The lowering into the grave aroused the toper, who made such a commotion that he was released. He was immediately fined $25 for creating a disturbance at a funeral.

Perhaps some of the sleeping society members remain silent for fear of being fined for creating a disturbance. For some to wake up and go to work would be as surprising as to see a man creating a disturbance at his own funeral.

Since Paderewski's marriage, the story is being revived of a well-known society woman who wrote to him for "a lock of hair." She received this reply:

Dear Madam:—M. Paderewski directs me to say that it affords him much pleasure to comply with your request. You failed to specify whose hair you desire, so he sends samples of that of his suite, valet, cook, waiter, and mattress belonging to M. Pullman, proprietor of the coach in which he traveled in America.

Mistaken Identity.

A Scotch minister was christening a baby, and took occasion to speak on the possible future of the infant. "This child," he said, "may grow to be the Archbishop of Canterbury. It may become a great politician and shine in the House of Commons, or even be prime minister of the realm. It may become a soldier like the Duke of Wellington, or a sailor like Lord Nelson. This child"—then turning to the mother—"What did you say the child's name was?"

"Mary Jane," replied the mother.

Tit for Tat.

The diners at a popular New York restaurant are said to have had the privilege of witnessing an amusing little incident one evening not long ago.

An anglicized young man seated himself at a table at which there was only one other person, a writer well known throughout the country, but evidently a stranger to the newcomer.

The writer is a man whose dress is always fastidiously neat, but by no means fashionable in cut or expensive in material. When the young man took his seat, the writer glanced up at him, and seeing that it was no one whom he knew, returned to his study of the bill of fare.

The young man languidly placed his monocle in his eye, and screwing up his face to keep the glass in position, treated the other guest at the table to a prolonged stare.

The stare ended abruptly, however, for suddenly the writer looked up. Quick as thought he seized an empty tumbler, and applying it to his right eye, stared gravely through its bottom at his vis-a-vis.

The monocle was dropped in a very few seconds, and then the tumbler was replaced on the table. But the young Anglomaniac's face was crimson, while that of the writer remained grave and unmoved, and through the dining-room rustled the sound of something that suggested repressed merriment. —Youth's Companion.

The Builders-Up and Tearers-Down.

Ye Builders-up and Tearers-down,
Lo, here is work for you,—
To level down the ignoble Old
And build the grander New.
There's music in the blow that frames
And in the blow that breaks;
There's virtue in the strength that builds
And in the strength that shakes.
Blest and thrice blest the hand that smites,
And blest the hand that rears;
Blest be the hand that rears and reaps,
And blest the hand that smites and sweeps
And cleans the cluttered years.

Ye Builders-up and Tearers-down,
A long day's work is yours,
To clear the rubbish and the wreck
For the temple that endures.
Shake down the faiths that cringe and blink
And, owl-like, love the night,
And build cathedrals for the souls
That dare to front the light.
Shake down all thrones built on a lie,
And bid their princes cease;
Drive forth the strife the world abhors,
And melt the cannons of your wars
To build the shrines of peace.

The great years greaten; learn to grow,
Ye sons of faith and skill;
A plastic world is in your hands,
Go, mold it to your will.
Go, guide your rivers through the sands,
And make your dead fens fair;
Pour sunlight through your swamps of gloom,
Make deserts glad with apple-bloom,
And grow your harvests there.

Tear down the world, build up the world;
Thus shall ye live your day;
And music sweet as woodland brooks
The noisy years shall play.
There's many a city yet to build
Where forest rivers gleam,
And many a snow-choked waste must hear
The thunder-steed of steam.
There are towering mountains to be scooped
On swamps of mist and murk;
Yet inland cities wed the seas,
The seas surge through the isthmuses—
Tear down! Build up! To work!

Ye Builders-up and Tearers-down,
The great years gaze on you,
And the work of thrice a thousand years
A hundred years must do.
Tear down the castes that make men hate,
The castes of creed and clan;
Build up the universal church
That makes man kin to man.
Strength to the merciless arm that smites,
The loving arm that rears;
Blest be the hand that rears and reaps,
And blest the hand that smites and sweeps
And cleans the cluttered years.

As One That Serveth.

"What most impressed you at Oberammergau?" was asked of a returned tourist recently.

"It was none of the things that the magazines tell about," replied the tourist. "It was the conduct of the young woman who waited on our table where we lodged."

"Tell me about it," said his friend.

"It was Anna Flunger, who took the part of Mary, the mother of Jesus. The only remarkable thing about it was that she was just as simple and unaffected as we might have expected any young woman of the village to be, though hers was the part which the young women of Oberammergau count worthy a life's ambition, and the greatest honor that can come to one of them in ten years, and but once to one.

"Saturday night she served us at table, and Sunday morning she served our simple breakfast, all as if unconscious that in an hour she would be the heroine in that sublime drama. I could not help wondering how many American girls would have done so, even on so much smaller an occasion as their graduation."

"And did it seem inappropriate?" asked his friend.

"Not at all. Indeed, that was the most interesting thing about it. It was a sort of revelation of the spirit of Christian service. Would not Mary, the mother of Jesus, have done the same? I could not help thinking that she would, and in much the same way. And then I could not help reflecting that Christ himself was among us as one that serveth.

"The best thing I got at Oberammergau was not anything that I saw on the stage. It was that simple exhibition of unaffected Christian service, and it helped me toward a truer interpretation of the true Christian spirit."—Youth's Companion.

The Foxy Fox.

By an old hunter and naturalist of local repute, a story has been told confirming as absolutely true and trustworthy the published account, which has had few believers until now, of how foxes rid themselves of fleas. The fox, according to the book narrative, simply backs slowly into a stream of water, with a portion of the pelt of a rabbit in his mouth, after the fox has made a meal of the rabbit. The water drives the fleas first up the fox's legs and then toward his head, and finally out upon the piece of rabbit fur, and then the fox drops the fur and his pests are done for.

The local hunter and naturalist referred to, strange to say, had never heard or read this story when he told of the actions of a fox which he observed the other day in the waters of the Patapsco river. The little animal, he stated, backed into the river slowly, with so much deliberation that he wondered what it meant. It carried something, he did not know what, in its mouth, and dropped the something when out in the deep water.

Then the fox hurried away. The object left floated near to the observer, and he hauled it ashore with a stick. Fleas literally swarmed through the object, which was found to be a bit of raw rabbit fur. The observer had a puzzling mystery explained to him. He says his admiration for the shrewdness of the fox grows more and more as he grows older and learns his ways.—Baltimore Sun.

"The Mewl," wrote a school boy, "is a hardier bird than the guse or turkey. It has two legs to walk with, two more to kick with and it wears its wings on the side of its head. It is stubbornly backward about going forward."

"What," exclaimed the orator, "what two things are helping mankind to get up in the world?"

"The alarm clock and the stepladder," answered the dense person in the rear of the hall.

Amelia.—Swear not by the moon, the inconstant moon.

Augustus.—Then what shall I swear by?

"Swear by that which you hold invaluable; something that you cannot live without."

"Then, Amelia, I love you; I swear it by my salary."

As Horace Mann sat in his studio one evening, an insane man rushed into the room, and after abusing him for all kinds of fancied grievances challenged him to a fight. Mr. Mann replied:

"My dear fellow, it would give me a great pleasure to accommodate you, but I can't do it, the odds are so unfair. I am a Mann by name and a man by nature—two against one! It would never do to fight."

The insane man answered: "Come ahead; I am a man, and a man beside myself; let us four have a fight."

Only Half True.

The following is an opinion doubtless to be shared by many Americans who heard Matthew Arnold lecture during his stay among us. After his return to London, at the close of his first American tour, he visited Mrs. Procter, the widow of "Barry Cornwall" and mother of Adelaide Procter.

The lady was then eighty years old, and in giving Mr. Arnold a cup of tea, she asked, with the pardonable frankness of age:

"And what did they say about you in America?"

"Well," said the literary autocrat, "they said I was conceited. They said my clothes did not fit me."

"Well, now," commented the old lady, "I think they were mistaken as to the clothes."—Youth's Companion.

Peking or Pekin.

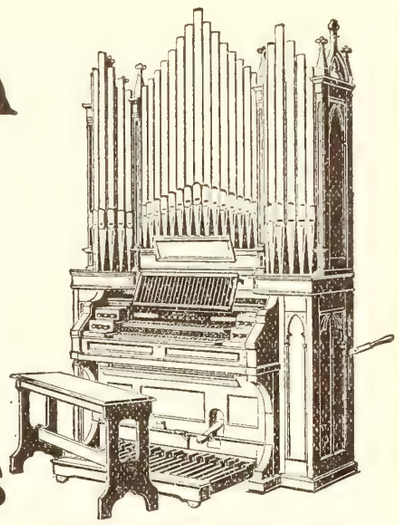
The editor of the Utica (N. Y.) Observer, believing himself to be in the right in spelling Peking, took steps to satisfy himself by addressing a letter of inquiry to Minister Wu, who promptly replied as follows:

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 14th inst., relating to the proper spelling of the Chinese capital. My opinion is that Peking is correct; for in the Chinese pronunciation, its final sound is that of "ng," and not of "n." The French I believe, write it "Pekin," because in their pronunciation of the word thus written, the Chinese sounds are preserved. But the spelling in English should be "Peking."

Very truly yours,

WU TING-FANG.

A Little Too Much.



The stranger in any city half a hundred years old, if he knew nothing of the city's history, would learn from many of the signs that the second and third generations had succeeded to the business of father and grandfather. It is especially true of New York. The New York Times mentions some peculiar signs, and relates the following, which we take to be true, although we do not vouch for it:

A Londoner, who had strolled about the streets of the city with a New Yorker who called his attention to some of the signs of sons, agreed that in this respect New York was very like London, but in neither city was there any such sign as he saw in one of the old English towns a few hours' run from the world's metropolis. The sign reads:

JOHN LITTLEJOHN'S SONS AND LITTLE (LITTLE LITTLEJOHN, DOOLITTLE LITTLEJOHN AND JOHN LITTLE).

According to the Londoner, the first Littlejohn and Little were partners. The former gave his first son his partner's family name, and Little gave his boy his partner's Christian name. Littlejohn's second son was named, for his mother's family, Doolittle. The three sons succeeded to their fathers' business, hence the sign is entirely correct, and the Londoner was right in saying that the successors had no intention of being "funny" when they had their sign written as it appears.—Youth's Companion.

Church and Chapel Organs

LISZT ORGAN. STYLE 806.
Two manuals and pedal bass.

Theodore Thomas writes concerning the Liszt Organ:

"They excel especially in richer, better qualities of tone. A wide acquaintance with musicians enables me to say that they generally regard the Mason & Hamlin Organ as unequalled by any others."

These organs are especially built for smaller churches and chapels, and at the moderate price for which they are sold, no other organ equals them for quality, volume and variety of tone. They have received the highest awards at all great international expositions, and the most unqualified endorsement of the greatest musicians of the world.

Brilliant But Useless.

Sir Astley Cooper on visiting Paris was asked by a surgeon-in-chief of empire how many times he had performed a certain wonderful feat of surgery. He replied that he had performed the operation thirteen times in the course of his career.

"Ah, but Monsieur, I have done it one hundred and sixty times.

"How many times did you save life?" continued the curious Frenchman.

"I," said the Englishman, "saved eleven out of the thirteen. How many did you save?"

"Ah, Monsieur, I lose dem all; but de operation was very brilliant."

How many sermons are very brilliant, but for spiritual purposes only useless!—Union Gospel News.

"Homer's Ill, I add!" promptly rejoined an adherent.

PETE.

XI.—Letitia's Punishment.

"This is always the way," said Letitia Pendleton, looking gloomily out of her window. It was the same Saturday morning on which Pete had had her last interview with Nap; but it was about two hours later; and it was raining. "It always takes Saturday to rain on," said Letitia despondingly. "And when it rains on other days it stops sometimes and clears off; but it never clears off on Saturday. When it begins to rain on Saturday, you know it has set in for all day. It does it to spite me!"

"Letitia," said her father, looking up from his newspaper, "don't be cross, my daughter." Now if there is anything calculated to try a girl's spirits it is to be told, "Don't be cross, my daughter," or, "Now you are getting mad," or something along that line, as the preachers say. So Letitia crept out of her room—she dared not flounce out, since her father had such a quick temper you really did not dare to trifle with him—and she went out on the porch. The rain was splashing at the edge of the porch and gurgling in the water-pipes and spattering on the rock steps. Letitia looked over the fence at Mrs. Morris' house. She saw Pete at her window. Pete made a face at her and went away. Pete was doubly cross, both on account of the rain and because her mother was firm about not letting her go to Linda May's party. The cat ran up on the porch to get out of the rain, but Letitia ran him off, just because she was unhappy and she wanted the cat to be unhappy. She saw her brother Arthur going down town in his rubber boots, walking in the middle of the road—because what's the use of wearing rubber boots if you stay on the sidewalk? Letitia was a little society lady and what she loved was making calls, dressed up very primly, or receiving little visitors. She did not care for romping games; she didn't like to read; she took no pleasure in banging on a piano, or in climbing. She was pretty good at doing fancy-work, and she liked to work flowers and leaves, after they had been marked off, if she was in her nice clothes and another girl was with her. In short, she enjoyed being a grown young lady, and she was as near a grown young lady as anybody at ten can be. Her father was an old gentleman who had married a lady very much younger than he; so it suited him for Letitia to sit on chairs and cross her feet. Well, it rained and rained and rained. Late in the afternoon Letitia saw Pete splashing about in her backyard in her bare feet and holding an old umbrella over her hair—which was done up in a tight knot on top of her head, just for fun. Letitia shuddered. She wouldn't have had that black mud oozing up between her toes for anything.

"Hi, Letitia!" called Pete, seeing her at her window, "come on. It's fun!"

"Thank you," said Letitia with dignity, "I never go barefooted."

"Aw, Tishy, Tishy, Tishy!" mocked Pete. Letitia burst into sobs. The next day was Sunday—naturally. Letitia seemed to get up in a wrong way. Do not get the impression that she was a child with an ugly disposition. Not at all. But you know there are days and seasons when most children are a burden to themselves, not to mention the spectators. It was a bright, cheery Sunday morning. That made it all the worse, to her mind. Here was all this sunshine as good as wasted. Why hadn't the sun shone on Saturday? Can you play on Sunday? She looked so cross when she came to the breakfast table that her brother Arthur, who was fourteen, asked her if she hadn't got out of bed on the wrong foot. That always made her cry, so she cried, and Mr. Pendleton sent her from the table. When her mother curled her hair for Sunday-school, she couldn't bring the comb near the gloomy head without eliciting a whine from Letitia. At last Mrs. Pendleton slapped her. Then she was not allowed to wear the dress she wanted to wear; and that is nearly more than one can bear, but not quite, of course; nothing is. And as she was setting forth for the church, looking glum and sulky, Arthur, who could see no sense in her unpleasant humor (because he was a boy) called after her, "Aw, baby, baby, baby; aw, baby, baby, baby!"

Letitia ran back in the house, her cheeks burning. Her father stood in the hall, his head very erect while his wife was fastening his collar. "Papa, make Arthur quit!" said Letitia. "What is he doing?" demanded Mr. Pendleton. "Well,"—this was to his wife—"can't you get it buttoned?"

"He's saying 'Aw, baby, baby, baby,'" complained Letitia. At that moment Mrs. Pendleton succeeded in fastening the collar. This was such a relief to Mr. Pendleton, whose neck had began to stiffen, that he only laughed. That made Arthur laugh, and then Mrs. Pendleton laughed. Letitia didn't. She went on to Sunday-school feeling that if she had ever had any friends, they had fallen one by one from her side. Letitia is acting so badly that I feel it necessary to say once more that usually she was a sweet-tempered, good little girl. What makes her act this way I'm sure I don't know, and I doubt if she does, herself. She usually sat with Pete and Madge and Linda May before classes, but to-day she pretended she didn't see them. She sat with some girls that she didn't like, just so she could be as miserable as she wanted to be. She heard Pete whisper to Linda May, "She's ma-a-a-a-ad." Linda May said, "What's she mad about?" " 'Cause I called her 'Tishy, Tishy, Tishy,' " said Pete. Letitia pretended like she didn't hear this dialogue. They began to sing a song—one of that kind that has a place in it where the bass and tenor rest, and only the women and girls ought to sing. Brother Gruck sat right in front of Letitia. Now there are some men that would rather have a spell of sickness than stop singing when the music tells them that the bass rests. Instead of resting they will croak along on the alto although they know men can't sing alto, and it spoils the music. Brother Gruck was just such a man. He meant well and he was a good man, but if there was one time he sang loudest and harshest, it was when he had no business to sing at all. So when they sang this song, every man stopped at the right place except Brother Gruck; he just croaked along as if he thought if he stopped it would ruin everything. This annoyed Letitia, who was a good singer. "Don't Brother Gruck think he's smart," she said to the girl next her, forgetting that the girl was Brother Gruck's daughter. "I've heard people say 'd be good thing 'fe'd move away!" As soon as Sunday-school was over, the girl told Brother Gruck what Letitia had said, and Brother Gruck told Mrs. Pendleton, and Mrs. Pendleton called Letitia to her side and said; "Letitia, I want you to go home and stay till I come. And you're not going to Linda May's party, either! This will be a lesson to you for repeating what you hear my visitors say in my parlor, in confidence." So there are two girls you know won't be at Linda May's party; Letitia and Pete; it's to be hoped Linda May's other friends will be better children, or there will be a good deal of ice cream left in the freezer.

You will find the edge taken off in a night; and, in three or four days, you'll be wondering whether that cold amounted to anything anyhow.

That's relief. If you tackle it quick, the relief is quick; if you wait, the relief won't come—you know how colds hang on.

Jesus Betrayed.*

John omits from his narrative the story of the agony of Jesus in Gethsemane, which is found in all the other evangelists. Did his loving soul shrink from the recital of such a scene? Perhaps so; for we find that he tells the story of the indignities heaped upon the Lord during his hasty and unjust trial in as few words as possible, as though it was more than he could bear to linger over the details. But the agony of the struggle was over. Perfect submission had brought its perfect peace; and Jesus came forth to where the three disciples were sleeping and said quietly, "Arise, let us be going: behold, he is at hand that betrayeth me." As the disciples sprang to their feet bewildered and ashamed, they could hear the clank of arms and see the gleam of spears through the boughs of the olives. The traitor, Judas, had secured from the Jewish authorities a company of guards from the temple, supported by a part of the Roman cohort that was stationed in the tower of Antonia, which overlooked the temple enclosure from the northwest corner. So important did the chief priests regard the arrest of Jesus that they had persuaded the "chief captain," or "chiliarch" who was in command of the Roman cohort to take charge of the forces. (See verse 12.) The soldiers and temple guards may have been accompanied by others of the hangers-on about the palace of the high priest, forming the disorderly "multitude" which had now reached Gethsemane. Those who had no swords bore clubs, while some carried lanterns and torches, that they might be able to discover Jesus, should he seek a refuge amid the dense shadows of the olives, or in some wayside cave of the rocks.

Conspicuous among this evil company was Judas, whose base betrayal of his Master must have earned for him even the scarce-concealed contempt of the Jewish leaders. He had given them a sign by which they should know Jesus amid his disciples. It was customary for teachers to be greeted by their loving followers with a kiss upon the cheek. He would thus salute the Nazarene, and they should then promptly seize him and lead him away. For Judas seems to have feared that some act, either on the part of Jesus himself or his disciples, would thwart his infamous plot. So soon, therefore, as the little company amid the olive trees became visible to Judas and his band, he hastened in advance, and calling out, "Hail, Rabbi," pressed upon the grief-marked cheeek of Jesus the kiss of betrayal. "The kisses of an enemy are deceitful." But never was there a caress so loathsome as this. The flesh of Jesus must have shrunk from the touch of those polluted lips. Only the high resolve which had led to his willing acceptance of the cup of dishonor and death could have enabled him to bear this most repulsive act of hypocrisy. As Judas approached to kiss Jesus, the Master gently asked him, "Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?" How could the traitor carry out his purpose, with this stinging rebuke ringing in his ears? But he had sold himself to do this great wrong and nothing could draw him back. As his foul lips touched the immaculate cheek of the Savior, Jesus said to him, "Friend, do that for which thou art come." Judas slunk back into the midst of the multitude, breathing easier now that his base task was done.

"Jesus, knowing all the things that were coming upon him, went forth, and said unto them, Whom seek ye? They answered him, Jesus of Nazareth. Jesus saith unto them, I am he." To their surprise, there is no attempt at escape or evasion. Meekly he waits upon their will. They are about to seize him when, lo, a sudden panic lays hold upon them all and they press backward upon one another in confusion, and stumbling fall on the ground. "In the person of the entrapped Rabbi stood majesty incarnate. He stood at his kingly height. His eye swept the soldiers and the Hebrews until it seemed as if it would have mown them down, man by man." While they lay there half stupefied, they heard again his calm voice, asking, "Whom seek ye?" Rising in confusion, they answer him as before, "Jesus of Nazareth." Then he said, "I have told you that I am he; let these others go their way; they have done no wrong." His disciples then remembered how, in his prayer for them in the upper room, he had said of his chosen ones, "None of them is lost but the son of perdition," and they felt once more how dearly their Lord loved them.

The soldiers and Jewish officers began to feel ashamed of their sudden fright. Why had they fallen to the earth? No fire had flashed forth to consume them. No thunder had smitten them. No armed host confronted them. Only a meek and unarmed man, surrounded by a little group of terrified disciples. They could not have told why. Often during the life of Jesus had his calm dignity disarmed his enemies and thwarted their malice. Such is often the power of a noble character surrounded by baseness. The slave who was sent to the prison to murder the noble Marius came running out at its gate and, throwing the sword to the earth, cried out, "I cannot slay Marius!" Jesus, a poor, obscure Jewish teacher, had but to let a little of his indwelling glory shine forth and it blinded the eyes and dismayed the hearts of all his foes. The officers now laid hands on Jesus to bind him, when the impetuous disciple could no longer restrain his indignation, and drawing his sword, smote one of the servants of the high priest, cutting off his right ear. Could this be the same disciple who was, within a few hours, to deny that he knew the Master? Such is the weakness of our poor humanity, driven to and fro by every wind of passion. Jesus rebuked the ardent disciple, telling him that such weapons were not those of the heavenly kingdom. "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds." Many a follower of Jesus since Peter's day has tried to wield the sword of the Spirit in much the same disposition as that of the rash disciple, and has only succeeded in cutting off the ears of his auditors, instead of winning them to a hearing of the truth. In love must the message ever be carried, or it will fall powerless upon men's hearts. "The cup which my Father hath given me to drink, shall I seek to evade it? Could I not summon twelve legions of angels to my defense, were that my present need? But the Scriptures must be fulfilled and the Son of man must die for the sins of the world, as I have often told you before."

Turning then to the wounded man. Jesus touched his ear and it was immediately healed. With a pathos that might have moved a heart of stone the Master said to the officers and the chief priests; "Are ye come out, as against a robber, with swords and staves? When I was daily with you in the temple, ye stretched not forth your hands against me: but this is your hour and the power of darkness." It was too late to move them from their purpose, reached through a long process of spiritual hardening, which had made their souls almost indifferent to truth or virtue. He was in their power at last and they eagerly bound his hands and led him hurriedly back into the city, to a trial that was a mockery and a death that made the city and nation forever the object of human scorn. "He carried himself before the people of his nation, a law-abiding man for thirty-three pure and blameless years. How did the law treat him? A sham trial, an illegal sentence, hurried him to a barbarous death. Between the moment of his arrest and that of his execution there dashed by, at the most, fifteen hours." Into the presence of Annas first, and then of Caiaphas, the Lord of life was led as an accused criminal, while those who ought to have been beside him, sharing his suffering and shame, were fleeing for safety in shameless and cowardly abandonment, for which they would afterwards have to drink the bitter cup of remembrance and remorse.

TOPIC FOR MARCH 3.

Religious Barrenness.

(Luke 13:6–9.)

The heart of this parable is to be found in the truth that good is growing often in that which appears to be barren. Here is a tree which one despairs of, a flower that seems never on the road to bloom, a life that appears to have no fruitfulness in good. What shall be done with them? Wait. Be patient. Bring to bear all possible influences for good. Something will set them right, perhaps.

It may be a very little thing that makes a life fruitful in true religious usefulness. A few drops of water seem very insignificant, but they will often save the life of a beautiful plant. A sprinkle of fertilizer is a very humble thing; but it may cause a fig tree to bear. A single word spoken to men or women about their eternal good may seem scarcely worth while, yet it may cause them to change the whole course of life.

And so, indeed, a very little thing may stand in the way of a large fruitage in the life. A hard-baked surface of ground only half an inch thick may ruin a tree. A few stones in a pot may kill certain kinds of plants. A small grain of dust in the eye may prevent the reading and the writing of masterpieces. A little thickening in the ear-drum may cause a great musical message or an inspiring word to be forever lost. So, also, a very little cherished wrong in the soul may keep a life from largeness and usefulness that might be truly great.

We all remember the powerful Corliss engine at the Centennial in Philadelphia, which would not go, until after days of search, they found a bit of two-inch steel that had slipped into the wrong place. So a life sometimes is kept out of great usefulness and power by a very little thing. Find it out! Cast it away! Is it the eye—very, very dear? Pluck it out! Is it the right hand—apparently indispensable? Cut it off! What is it, fellow-endeavorer, that keeps your life or mine from its largest usefulness and dignity? Away with it from the earth, whatsoever it is! Let the life loose for fruit-bearing!

It is life and fruitfulness that are the essential things in this world. Anything that stands in the way of life must be hunted out and cast away like the disease-breathing offal. Whatever stands in the way of man and man's largest development must go. Jesus said, "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath." Therefore, just so soon as the Sabbath began to cripple man and to make his life barren, it had to go. So, whatever stands in the way of man and man's largest growth, be it a Sabbath, a church, an organization, a system, a book, anything—that thing must go.

If we sweep away all such hindrances, open or hidden, that may be in our way, we shall not be "barren or unfruitful." There is no fig tree but, in proper conditions, it can be made to bear; no life but, with proper care, it can be made to bloom and bring forth fruit. It is ours to find the need of our hearts in one way and another, and to bring them into harmony with God and with God's laws in the world around.

After an illness of a few weeks at his home near Holden, Johnson county, Mo., O. H. P. Briscoe departed this life. He was born Jan. 2, 1814, died Jan. 5, 1901, at the age of 86 years. Was born in Kentucky and moved to Missouri in an early day and settled in Cooper county, near what is now Belaire. He was one of the pioneers of the state of Missouri; moved to Johnson county in 1854, where he resided until the time of his death. In 1836 he was united in marriage with Miss Ursula P. Huff who preceded him in 1887. To this union 12 children were born, 11 of whom survive him. He was united with the Christian Church soon after his marriage and has lived a consistent Christian life to his death. He was an elder in the church for several years before he died. It was one of the joys of his life to listen to the preaching of George Longan and other prominent ministers of an early day. He took great interest in the education of his children and was a kind and loving husband and father. LOLA BRISCOE.

CHRISTOPHER.

Departed this life in the city of St. Joseph, Mo., at the residence of his son-in-law, Dr. H. W. Westover, at 10 A. M., January 21, 1901, Hiram Cristopher, M. D., in the 82nd year of his age. He was born in the state of Maryland, but was brought up on a farm near the city of Louisville, Ky. In his early manhood he went into the city and learned the trade of a carpenter. About this time he confessed his faith in Christ and became a member of the First Christian Church. While at his trade he secured a position in the Louisville post office. Living economically he saved a sufficient amount to pay his way at college. He was a member of the first graduating class of Bethany College. He distinguished himself in all his college studies, but especially in the natural sciences. After his graduation he returned to Louisville and studied medicine, and was graduated from Louisville Medical College. In the year 1849 he settled in St. Louis and began the practice of medicine. During that year the cholera prevailed in St. Louis, and the young doctor secured at once an extensive practice. He was an active and prominent member of the First Church under the ministry of the lamented S. S. Church. For many years he was an elder in this church, which he never ceased to love. In 1854 he was married in Fayette, Mo., to Miss Nannie S. McGarvey, sister of Pres. J. W. McGarvey. Of this union three daughters were born, all of whom are members of the church. They are Mrs. Dr. Westover, of St. Joseph, Mrs. Jno. A. Sea and Mrs. Fannie Buford, widow of the late Geo. Buford, of Independence, Mo. He continued the practice of medicine in St. Louis until the fall of 1858, when he was elected professor of natural sciences in Bethany College. Here he taught until the college was practically closed on account of the Civil War. Returning to Missouri in 1862 he located in Lexington, where he practiced for a time and then returned to St. Louis; but just as he was gathering up his old friends and his practice he fell from a street car and was lamed for life. After partial recovery he was made medical examiner of the Mound City Mutual Life Insurance Co. and continued till the company failed. He again resumed the practice of his profession, but it was now too late to gather up his practice again. In the year '78 or '79 he removed with Prof. J. W. Ellis to Independence, Mo., to establish a school for young men. This enterprise was not as successful as he had hoped. One of his daughters having married and settled in St. Joseph, Mo., he removed to that place and opened an office for office practice. He was soon thereafter made the Dean of Enright Medical College and subsequently became the editor of the Medical Herald, which positions he held to the time of his death. Dr. Christopher was a student all his professional life and regarded as an able man in his profession. He was indeed a recognized leader among physicians, but he was also a lover of Christianity and a profound student of the Scriptures. By his mental constitution he was radically conservative. He was profoundly orthodox. Those who knew him only by his controversial papers had little idea of the man. His heart was as tender as a woman's and no man loved his friends and brothers with a tenderer love. He was the author of several very thoughtful books. Of these the "Remedial System" was, perhaps, the ablest, though his recent work "On the Immanence of God in Nature" is a most thoughtful and interesting work. Dr. Christopher was a devoted and tender husband, a fond father and a true friend. In his profession he was transparently honest. In his deportment he was modest, almost bashful. In his last illness he was patient and hopeful. He died of indigestion, though of course he was greatly enfeebled by age. He passed away in the full possession of his mental faculties and did not murmur. The writer knew him well and loved him as a brother. His funeral sermon was preached by the writer from the words: "Know ye not that a prince and a great man in Israel is fallen this day." T. P. H.

HARRIELL.

Geo. W. Harriell died of pneumonia, Feb. 2, 1901. He was born near Bismarck, Mo., April 3, 1866. Joined the Christian Church in January, 1886; was married to Miss Lucy Mays, Oct. 28, 1886. He was baptized by Bro. W. H. Hale at New Tennessee Church, St. Genevieve county. He has lived a consistent Christian life. He leaves a wife, two children, an aged mother, one brother and many other relatives to mourn their loss. After a funeral discourse by the writer, he was laid to rest in the DeLassus cemetery.

Departed this life Wednesday, February 6, 1901. Besides his faithful life companion he leaves nine children. Bro. Hostetter was a faithful Christian and so reared his family. His funeral was held at the church where he felt so much at home. It was conducted by Bro. J. T. Ogle, of Guthrie, O. T., and the writer. E. H. KELLAR.

Book Notes.

In preparing to issue a book, the publisher may proceed upon one of two policies: He may say, "I will see how cheap a book I can produce," or he may say, "I will see how good a book I can prepare," and then when his book is ready, say further, "Now how cheap can I afford to sell this book?" There is a mighty difference in these two policies. The latter course is the one followed by this company. This is especially true of The Christian Lesson Commentary. We have never tried to see how cheap a book we could produce, making cheapness the primary consideration. We have, instead, labored to make the best commentary possible, regardless of expense, and then figured to see how cheaply we could sell it, when prepared. We could prepare a fairly good commentary, as good as many that are published, which we could sell for forty or fifty cents per copy. We believe, however, that our patrons prefer a strictly first-class book at a little higher price. Therefore The Christian Lesson Commentary stands in a class all by itself—the favorite help of all our leading Sunday-school workers.

"I think you must lie awake of nights thinking how you can help us poor preachers to get books," writes a brother who is impressed by our time payment plan and takes advantage of it. Nor was he far wrong. We are kept busy filling orders that come to us, but our presses are busy printing more books and within our store-rooms are tens of thousands of volumes. As long as these books lie stored away they are doing no good whatever. They must get out among the people before they can accomplish that whereunto they were printed, and therefore we are anxious to get them out. Never before were good books sold so cheaply. The standard literature of no other religious body is obtainable on such easy terms.

What is Your Life? by W. J. Russell, our latest book, is a delightful volume. It is a book of most wholesome advice and admonition to the young but—mirabile dictu!—it is at the same time a bright, breezy, entertaining, interesting volume. Fact! Mr Russell is neither a crank nor a fanatic. He is still a young man himself, is certainly young in spirit, and writes in a manner acceptable to young people. His language is the best. He has made a very liberal use of quotation and illustration. What is Your Life? is easily worth $10,000 to any young man or woman who will carefully follow its precepts and advice, but it can be purchased for the ten-thousandth part of that amount—one dollar. It is a volume of 302 pages, handsomely bound.

Not long ago we received a letter that ran about like this: "I want you to send me a pair of baptismal pants. I have bought two pair from another house, and I want to see if yours will not last better. I enclose herewith —— dollars, which is the price the other house has charged me." We sent him the pants, and also returned part of the money, for he had sent more than our price for a superior article. The moral of this incident is that it pays to deal with the house that does the largest business and sells at lowest prices.

How to Understand and Use the Bible, by J. H. Bryan, is a book that may be read and studied with profit by preachers, teachers and all engaged in Christian work. A sword is a practically useless weapon to the man who does not know how to handle it. The workman cannot accomplish much with a tool which he does not understand. The Bible, which is the chief tool used by the Christian worker and the chief weapon of the Christian soldier, must be thoroughly understood if it is to be effective. How to Understand and Use the Bible, is a plain, practical book of instruction. There are none so ignorant that they cannot comprehend this book, and none so learned that they may not profit by reading it. The price is but 50 cents.

For simplicity, conciseness, cheapness and practical, every-day use, no commentary is superior to The People's New Testament, with Notes, by B. W. Johnson. It is a work that grows in popularity as the years go by. Instead of being a ponderous work in twenty volumes, costing forty dollars, or more, it is comprised in two volumes, costing two dollars per volume, or four dollars, complete. Its comments are full enough for the preacher or the profound scholar, and simple enough for use in the home, by young people, Sunday-school teachers, etc.

THE CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING COMPANY.

A Great and Growing Journal.

The regular issue of Our Young Folks for this week was the largest in its history—much larger, without doubt, than that of any similar paper ever printed among the Disciples of Christ. Yet large as the circulation is, it is not at all commensurate with the merits of that great Young People's Weekly. Young People's, we said, but in fact it is a journal for all classes, and is as largely read by "fathers and mothers in Israel" as by the young folks of the Sunday-school and Endeavor Society. It should circulate extensively in every Christian Sunday-school, Society, Church and community.

There is no reason why Christian people should be content with inferior publications, when the very best is offered them at the lowest possible price. Our Young Folks is a large, sixteen-page weekly, and may be had in clubs of ten and upwards at 50 cents per copy per year. Address Our Young Folks, 1522 Locust Street, St. Louis, Mo.

Among our Advertisers.

Barclay Meador, Advertising Manager.

No line of business is to-day kept before the public more constantly, by means of advertising, than that of railroad traffic. Readers have probably noticed the publicity given to the announcement of special rates to inaugural ceremonies at Washington, D. C., early in March. One fare for the round trip is exceedingly cheap. Tickets are good going on March 1st, 2nd and 3rd, and good returning up to March 8th. The B. & O. S. W. makes its announcement in our columns. Readers who contemplate making the trip will find this route a desirable one from many points of view. The equipment is all that could be desired, the route quite picturesque and direct, while the time has been reduced to the minimum, and officials and trainmen are watchful of the welfare of patrons.

Correspondence schools have come to stay. They meet a real need. Their advantages are at once apparent. Central University, located at Indianapolis, is one of the schools of this kind which is seeking to bring its method of instruction by mail to the attention of our readers through our advertising columns. Readers who have been deprived of attendance upon school or college will do well to inform themselves concerning this institute.

Our back page last week contained an advertisement put out by the publishers of that very popular weekly known as "Success." The publishers, the McGraw-Marden Co., New York city, offer, with their splendid weekly, several of the leading magazines at surprisingly low figures. Every home where there are young people should be visited weekly by "Success." The combination offer there referred to should interest every one of our readers. If any one hasn't a copy of our issue of the 14th, containing the advertisement, at hand we will mail it gratis on application.

Oh, may I join the choir invisible
Of those immortal dead who live again
In minds made better by their presence; live
In pulses stirred to generosity,
In deeds of daring rectitude, in scorn
For miserable aims that end with self,
In thoughts sublime that pierce the night like stars,
And with their mild persistence urge man's search
To vaster issues.

. . . . . .

This is life to come,
Which martyred men have made more glorious
For us who strive to follow. May I reach
That purest heaven; be to other souls
The cup of strength in some great agony;
Enkindle generous ardor; feed pure love;
Beget the smiles that have no cruelty—
Be the sweet presence of a good diffused,
And in diffusion even more intense.
So shall I join the choir invisible
Whose music is the gladness of the world.

WHAT WE STAND FOR

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

"Bells of Easter-Tide"

A Beautiful New Concert Service For Easter Sunday . . . . . .

It is now only a short time until Easter Sunday. It is time to prepare for any special service which your Sunday-school will have upon that occasion. Do not wait until the last moment, but begin in time. Easter Day should be made beautiful with music and flowers.

"Bells of Easter-Tide" is a concert service, including music, recitations and appropriate selections from the Scriptures. The songs are by W. J. King and W. E. M. Hackleman. The poems and recitations are the work of Birdie Bell, E. E. Hewitt and Jennie Wilson. Both the authors and composers have done their work excellently.

"Bells of Easter-Tide" makes a pamphlet of sixteen pages, with a handsomely designed Easter cover. The price for single copy is five cents; per dozen, fifty cents, postpaid. Send the publishers five cents at once for a sample copy.

Once again, let us warn all our Sunday-school friends that the time is short. Easter Sunday comes on April 7, or in about four weeks from the present time. Not a day should be lost. "Bells of Easter-Tide" is not a difficult exercise, but time and careful preparation are required to satisfactorily present the simplest service.

Our Relations With Cuba. The Cuban constitution was completed and signed by the members of the constitutional convention on Feb. 21. Senor Cisneros refused to sign the copy which is to be transmitted through Gen. Wood to Washington, on the ground that the submission of the constitution to any one outside of Cuba for approval was inconsistent with their claim of independence. The constitution makes no attempt to define the relations which are to subsist between the United States and Cuba. It seems to be a common-sense view of the case that, if the United States has undertaken to govern Cuba until the Cubans can establish a stable government, it has a right to consider whether or not the new government which is being formed is one to which it can safely turn over the task. Senator Platt has introduced an amendment to the army appropriation bill, to the effect that the President be authorized to surrender the government of Cuba to the people thereof as soon as a government shall be established which, by the constitution or statute, shall define the relations of the United States to Cuba as follows: That no treaty shall be made with any foreign power impairing the independence of Cuba; that a public debt shall not be contracted disproportionate to the revenue; that the United States may intervene to preserve Cuban independence and maintain a government adequate for the protection of life, property and liberty and to discharge the obligations imposed by the treaty of Paris; that the acts of the United States in Cuba during its military occupancy shall be ratified; that plans for the sanitation of Cuban cities be agreed upon and carried into effect; that the title to the Isle of Pines shall be left to future adjustment by treaty; that the United States be permitted to buy or lease lands in Cuba for coaling or naval stations; and that these provisions be embodied in a permanent treaty between Cuba and the United States. This represents practically the ground taken by the administration, and if this bill is passed an extra session of Congress will not be necessary so far as this matter is concerned. Many of the Cubans will consider that these provisions infringe upon their independence and there will be Democratic opposition in Congress on the ground of imperialism.

Congress. Both houses of Congress are involved in the rush of business preceding their adjournment on March 3. The Senate has been called to meet in extra session on March 4 to ratify executive appointments. It is still uncertain whether a special session of Congress will be called to consider the Cuban constitution. The necessity for this may be obviated by the passage of Senator Platt's amendment to the army appropriation bill. The deadlock on the revenue bill, which is in conference, has not yet been broken. The House has passed the sundry civil bill and has begun the consideration of the general deficiency bill, the last of the big appropriation bills. The Senate has passed the post office and the diplomatic and consular appropriation bills. In the former the appropriation for maintaining the pneumatic tube service for distributing the mails to the sub-stations in some of the larger cities was discontinued. An amendment was adopted authorizing the postmaster-general to investigate the matter of establishing a telegraph system in connection with the postal service. The Senate refused to concur in the House bill punishing hazing at the military and naval academies with dismissal and permanent disability for holding office. It was held that expulsion from the academy was punishment enough.

World's Fair Legislation. The bill appropriating $5,000,000 for the Louisiana Purchase Exposition has been unanimously passed by the Senate, but the House measure was not concurred in without amendment. Mr. Tillman, of South Carolina, added a rider appropriating $250,000 for the Interstate and West Indian Exposition to be held in Charleston, D. C., and Mr. Teller offered an amendment requiring the St. Louis fair to be closed on Sunday. Both of these amendments were adopted with the bill. The time remaining at this session is very short, and it will require hard work on the part of those in charge of the measure to get the House to agree to these amendments or to effect a compromise in conference before the date of adjournment. The Sunday closing feature is objectionable to many and it has been suggested that there be a compromise on the basis of a "still Sunday," allowing the fair to be open as a park, but the machinery not running and no entertainments being given. It will be remembered that in the Word's Fair of 1893 the question of Sunday opening settled itself. When it was found that the Fair did not pay expenses on that day, it was closed in self-defense. Something like that will very probably happen in this case even if Sunday opening is permitted.

St. Louis Appointments. Gov. Dockery has at last announced the names of his appointees for police and election commissioners in St. Louis. The police commissioners are Harry B. Hawes, William F. Woerner, Theodore R. Ballard, and Andrew F. Blong and the election commissioners are James J. McCaffery, chairman, John M. Wood and William A. Hobbs. The comments in the daily press are to the effect that these appointments will come as near to "satisfying all the Democrats" as any appointments could. It is not suggested that they will be specially satisfactory outside of the party ranks. Mr. Hawes and Mr. McCaffery have already served one term each on their respective boards, both unacceptably in the judgment of most of the citizens of St. Louis. Mr. Hawes, as President of the Board of Police Commissioners during the past two years, must bear his share of the responsibility for a notoriously corrupt administration of the police department, and Mr. McCaffery is not believed to be entirely blameless in connection with the disgraceful proceedings which characterized the conduct of the election last November. The leading Democratic paper of St. Louis finds it necessary to explain editorially that it "did not directly or indirectly recommend the appointment of Mr. Hawes." St. Louis, it seems to us, had a right to expect better things of the new governor than the re-appointment of the very men who have been conspicuous in the corruptions of which St. Louis is now heartily ashamed. Excise Commissioner Seibert is pursuing his investigation of the saloons and wine rooms and has revoked the licenses of two saloon-keepers. Most of the testimony received from policemen and others seems intended to prove that the saloons are nurseries of virtue and encouragers of domestic peace. They are all "patronized by the most respectable persons and conducted in a quiet, orderly manner." But occasionally the truth will out and a license is revoked, as in the cases cited. Mr. Seibert is apparently doing the best he can, against odds, to clean up the city.

China. Perhaps as a result of Count von Waldersee's bullying threat of a military demonstration, or perhaps as the outcome of more legitimate diplomacy, China has come to a sudden agreement with the Powers on the question of punishments. Without surrendering completely to every demand, the Emperor has instructed his envoys to concede the following punishments: three of the accused leaders are to be beheaded, three are to be forced to commit suicide, Prince Tuan and Duke Lan are to be disgraced and exiled, and Tung Fu Hsian is to be deprived of military rank, with the assumption that he will receive still heavier punishment after his army has been taken from him so that he cannot resist. Some of the executions took place last Sunday and it is believed that this part of the negotiations is now virtually at an end. The point remaining to be discussed is the matter of indemnities. It is reported that an international agreement has been made that no Power shall acquire territory in China without the consent of the others. Minister Conger is coming home on leave of absence and Mr. Rockhill has been commissioned to act as the representative of the United States in the peace negotiations. Count von Waldersee's military expedition has been indefinitely postponed. The suggestion met with a flat refusal from the United States and with varying degrees of disapproval from the other Powers.

Mrs. Nation Acquitted. On Thursday of last week the case of the proprietors of the Senate saloon versus Mrs. Nation was tried in Topeka by Judge McCabe. The facts agreed upon by the attorneys were that she and her followers smashed the contents and fixtures of the place, but did so without malice and only with the purpose of abating a public nuisance. The court decided (1) that a person cannot be convicted under the "malicious mischief" statutes when it is conceded that malice did not exist; (2) that if there had been no stipulation that malice did not exist, the court might have indulged the presumption, judging from the act, that it did exist. This acquittal did not affect the other cases in which complaint had been entered against Mrs. Nation and she was held on her refusal to give a $2,000 bond to keep the peace. Sunday night she decided to give the bond and was released. Monday night there was a lively raid on a liquor supply house. Mrs. Nation has gone to Peoria, Ill., where she will have charge of one issue of the Peoria Evening Journal. In the course of a raid on a saloon at Millwood, fourteen miles north of Leavenworth, the bartender's wife was shot and killed. There is reason to believe that the raid was not conducted by temperance people, but that men who had a grudge against the saloon-keeper seized upon the raid idea, now so popular in Kansas, as an occasion to get even with him.

Tariff War With Russia. It looks at present very much as if the United States were getting the worst end of the bargain in the dealings which have taken place lately between our Treasury Department and the Russian authorities. Our present tariff law provides for a special tariff upon imported goods which are favored with a bounty by the country from which they are exported. Beet-sugar, which is one of the increasingly important products of Russia, is made the object of an internal revenue tax by that government, but this tax is remitted upon beet-sugar which is exported from Russia. Secretary Gage has ruled that this constitutes practically a bounty upon the export of beet-sugar and has accordingly directed that a countervailing duty be levied on Russian sugar imported into this country. Russia has instantly retaliated by increasing the tax on American imports 20 to 50 per cent. The promptness with which this action was taken almost suggests that Russia was looking for a chance to give a set-back to American trade and seized upon this as a pretext. As our exports to Russia are more than ten times greater than our imports of her beet-sugar, it seems that we do not stand to win by the arrangement. It is worth remembering, too, that of our exports to Russia by far the greater part are products of our manufactories and that this is the branch of our foreign trade, the development of which is now of the greatest importance. Russia's retaliation may indicate that she is realizing, as the other Powers have already, that the United States has become a dangerous competitor in the battle for commercial supremacy.

South Africa. Ex-President Steyn and Gen. De Wet have issued a proclamation denouncing the British for employing modes of warfare which are contrary to the usage of civilized Powers, capturing ambulances and doctors and maltreating women and children and destroying the property of noncombatants. Just where the truth lies between the accusations of brutality which the British and Boer leaders have hurled back at each other at intervals throughout the war, the world will perhaps never know. Gen. Kitchener is not a man of mild methods, but since the Boers have adopted a method of continuing the war after all reasonable hope of victory had vanished and have adopted a plan of campaign which can be met only by a policy of general starvation they cannot throw the blame entirely upon Gen. Kitchener. Since they have made their soldiers indistinguishable from the noncombatants, they ought not to be surprised if the latter suffer. It is reported with the appearance of truth that DeWet's raid into Cape Colony has been a complete failure and has ended in a serious defeat near Hopetown by the troops under Col. Plumer, involving the capture of many prisoners and a large amount of supplies. Gen. French is operating with equal success against Gen. Botha's commandoes, and has captured still greater quantities of provisions. Gen. Kitchener's policy has made the veldt so complete a wilderness that even the Boers can scarcely find upon it the means of subsistence.

Pacification in the Philippines. So far as one can judge from reports, very gratifying progress is being made in the restoration of peace in the Philippines. There is less fighting now than there has been at any time and the losses are small. Many voluntary surrenders are being made by bands of Filipinos. The recent tour of the Peace Commissioners through the northern part of Luzon produced many evidences that the feeling of the natives toward the United States is becoming more friendly. As local self-government is more and more fully established, it is increasingly obvious even to the wayfaring man, though a Tagal and an habitual revolutionist, that good government without political independence is better than chaos under the name of freedom. Nevertheless we hope that the time may soon come when they can have both good government and independence. Meanwhile the Commission is getting on fairly well in establishing civil government as far as it has been authorized.

A Use for the North Pole. Capt. Bernier, a Canadian navigator, who intends to sail early in the spring on a pole-seeking expedition, differs from the other Arctic enthusiasts in having a practical end in view. The northern sea-coast of North America and the islands beyond it have been so little explored that the northern boundary of the Dominion of Canada remains somewhat vague and indeterminate. But here in this unexplored region are valuable fisheries which are being invaded by Americans to the extent of several million dollars annually. Canada cannot claim this territory by right of discovery because she has neither discovered nor explored it. Capt. Bernier believes that the northern boundary of Canada ought to be the North Pole at which point a boundary line drawn through Behring Sea will converge with a continuation of the line between Canada and Alaska. If he succeeds in reaching the North Pole, he will, he says, lay claim in the name of Canada to the entire territory within these lines, by right of discovery. Whether or not his government will back up his claim in the improbable event of his finding the pole is another matter, but here, at least, is a polar expedition which alleges some other motive than the interests of pure science.

What it Has Done For Us.

No doubt many of our writers will tell what we have done for the foreign mission work and what remains to be done. Let us mention a few things the work of foreign missions has done for us as a religious movement. There is a reciprocity here which we do well to remember.

1. It has, first of all, given the most convincing proof to ourselves and to others of our faith in the universality of the gospel and in its power to save and elevate the most degraded peoples. It has demonstrated our conviction, too, of the ability of Christianity to cope with pagan religions, and of the utter inability of the latter to meet the wants of our human nature. Those who class Christianity along with the ethnic religions, and regard it as having no higher claim to the faith and reverence of men, do not engage in foreign mission work to any extent. Why should they?

2. It has turned our attention and energies away from the refined subtleties of theological and ecclesiastical discussions to the supreme task of evangelizing the world, and has, therefore, contributed mightily to prevent division and to promote unity among us. Whatever tendencies toward schisms there have been among us have not originated with those actively enlisted in world-wide evangelization.

3. It has perhaps done more than any other one thing to develop a more spiritual conception of religion and to deepen the spiritual life. No people can seriously face the problems involved in such a work without realizing the need of a closer fellowship with Christ, and of much prayer for divine strength and guidance. It broadens our sympathies, widens the range of our thoughts, enlarges the bounds of our fellowship, and in every way ennobles the character, to give ourselves earnestly to this unselfish service for humanity. We are indeed debtors to the whole heathen world from the reflex influence that has come to us from our efforts to give them the gospel. We have saved ourselves in trying to save others.

4. It has kept alive in us the sense of heroism as applied to religion, and has produced the noblest and most useful type of hero that the world has seen. The age of the crusades for the recovery of Christ's tomb and of knightly wanderings in search of the Holy Grail—splendid futilities in the name of religion—is past. Our era is prone to forget the high ideals of personal heroism in other than military matters, and to rely upon the social machinery of institutions, committees and associations for the work of lifting the fallen and saving the world. Foreign missionary work has shown us Christian heroes, not seeking but carrying to others the holy cup of divine love, not fighting for the tomb of the dead Christ but conquering in the name and power of a risen and saving Christ. More than any other factor of our present-day Christianity, the foreign missionary has nourished a sane and wholesome conception of the heroic.

5. Finally, nothing has done so much to win the respect and recognition of the religious world as what we have done in behalf of the world's evangelization. Religious movements are measured like individuals, by what they accomplish—what part they perform of the great task which Christ laid on the Church. Until we had taken up this work in earnest, the world lacked the highest evidence that we had been called of God to advance His kingdom in the world.

If God has thus blessed us for the limited efforts we have put forth to carry out the command of Christ to "preach the gospel to every creature," what will He not do for us when we give ourselves to this work as fully and as whole-heartedly as its supreme importance demands? We may confidently rely upon Christ's blessing to rest richly upon those who undertake seriously to do His work in the world and for the world.

The Theology of Experience.

The thirtieth Fernley lecture, delivered at Burslem, England, last July, by Dr. Charles J. Little, president of Garrett Biblical Institute, Evanston, Ill., is now published under the title of Christianity and the Nineteenth Century. The lecture, as a whole, is very suggestive, and certainly affords food for serious reflection. After giving a somewhat unsatisfactory sketch of the Christianity of the Pope, the Czar and the people, the lecture proceeds to discuss what the author calls the "Christianity of experience." The chief value of the lecture will be found in that part where the author estimates the true character of the Reformation under Luther and his colaborers. "The hidden root of the Reformation," he says, "was and is the attainment and paramount authority of a living experience of Christ in the soul of the believer." As to the Theology of the Reformation, he claims that, "like the mechanics of Galileo, it started from experience." He then points out how soon theology departed from its original starting point and as a consequence became what it now is, a bewildering maze of metaphysical subtleties. In short, the volume, as we now have it, is a strong plea for a scientific treatment of theology, as the only method that will bring order out of the present confusion.

What is stated in respect to this matter is precisely what the Disciples have been saying ever since their religious movement was started. They have contended that the inductive method of reasoning should be applied to the Scriptures, just as it is applied to nature, in the area of science. Indeed, it was a maxim with Alexander Campbell and those associated with him that "where the Scriptures speak we should speak; and where they are silent we should be silent." This clearly implies that the Scriptures must be searched and properly interpreted in order that they may be clearly understood. It furthermore implies that this searching must be by the inductive method; and this is exactly the method which was constantly used by the Campbells, and it is still the method of all Disciple teachers who understand the reformation for which they plead. Indeed, it is this very method which has made their plea such a decided force in the religious world. The old dogmatic method brought confusion rather than harmony. It did not ask the Scriptures what they said, but did they say what was declared to be true before any appeal was made to them? The inductive method sought earnestly for the truth, no matter whether it supported this or that theory. In fact, all theories should bend under the influence of a true interpretation of the word of God. It is not affirmed that the Disciples have always been free from a preconceived opinion while studying the Scriptures. They, like others, no doubt have, at times, been more or less influenced by a certain bias which has had its growth in a denominational atmosphere. A desire to be consistent with what is understood as Disciple teaching has unquestionably sometimes led to a false method of studying the Scriptures. But, upon the whole, it can, we think, be truthfully said of the leaders of the Disciple movement that their aim has always been to accept loyally the result of an honest induction of the Scriptures, no matter what that result might be.

There is, however, another view of this matter which deserves very special attention. Dr. Little seems to reach the conclusion that experience must be the final test as regards theology, as well as the religious life. In this connection, much depends upon the meaning of the word experience. Saul of Tarsus had had as definite experimental proof that he was doing God's service, while he was persecuting the church, as he ever had during his Christian life. He tells us that he was "fully persuaded" that the course he pursued was right and that he "ought to do many things contrary to Jesus of Nazareth, which things also he did." This language expresses the very highest degree of conviction and certainly nothing of the character of personal experience could be better proof of fidelity to God than that which is here produced. Nevertheless, Saul's experience did not make his conduct right. It would not be very far wrong to say that he was at least half right.

The ethical sphere is made up of two hemispheres. These are God and man—the divine and human; the objective truth and the subjective recognition of it. These supplement each other and make assurance doubly sure in the case of every soul that seeks to rest in God. We can no more do without an objective revelation than we can do without the inner consciousness that recognizes that revelation. Consequently, a theology that is wholly based on human experience cannot be trustworthy, for the reason that human experience is itself untrustworthy. It is freely admitted that just here we touch a very difficult problem. Still, it is a problem which can be solved, though every factor must be carefully reckoned with.

It is easy, however, just here to wreck upon either Scylla or Charybdis. Some have gone to one extreme and some to the other. Dr. Little, we fear, has not wholly guarded against the extreme of the human side of this question. Much of the mysticism, in certain religious circles, comes from the notion that what experience justifies is all that is needed as an assurance of salvation. Hence, there are those who make their appeals entirely to what is called their inner consciousness, and trust wholly to its response, for all the certainty they have in their religious life. This inner consciousness is right as far as it goes, but it must correspond with the word of God, or it will not answer the purposes of the soul in seeking full assurance and perfect rest. The experimental method is the only safe one in both theology and the practical duties of Christianity, but this method must hold fast to both of the hemispheres which we have indicated as belonging to the whole circle of truth. This is the only way of escape from the extremes to which attention has been called.

Hour of Prayer.

The Light of the World.

TEXT.—There came a man, sent from God, whose name was John. The same came for witness, that he might bear witness of the light, that all might believe through him. He was not the light, but came that he might bear witness of the light, there was the true light, even the light which lighteth every man, coming into the world. —John 1:6-9

Jesus declared of Himself, "I am the light of the world." At another time He said, "I am come a light into the world, that whosoever believeth on me should not abide in darkness." When He was transfigured, it was said of Him, "And His face did shine as the sun, and His raiment was white as the light." Thus over and over this brilliant metaphor is applied to our Lord and Master.

The True Light.

Lights are primary and secondary. "John, as a professed Savior, would have been weak and contemptible; but as a witness, he was a burning and a shining light." There had been many witnesses, a long and illustrious line, from Moses to John. They had caught faint glimpses of the coming day; they all in turn bore witness to the Light. And now it has come. The orient dawn has blossomed into universal day. The stars are light-giving; the moon is a brilliant and beautiful reflector; but stars and moon pale into obscurity when the sun rises.

Jesus Christ is the true light, because He is at once universal and individual. He shines for all, yet the humblest can look up and say, "Thou art mine!" The sun does not shine, says a great preacher, for a few trees and flowers, but for the wide world's joy. The lonely pine on the mountain-top waves its sombre boughs and cries, "Thou art my sun." And the little meadow violet lifts its cup of blue, and whispers with its perfumed breath, "Thou art my sun." And the grain in a thousand fields rustles in the wind and makes answer, "Thou art my sun." So Christ shines, evermore and everywhere radiant, and there is no human creature so mean or so obscure that he may not say, "The Lord is my light and my salvation, whom shall I fear?"

The Luminous Word.

"Thy word is a lamp unto my feet,
And light unto my path."—Ps. 119:105.

God's heart throbs in His word, and wherever it goes, go life and light. It tells us what our duty and destiny are; it reveals things otherwise hidden. It disperses our doubts like clouds before the sun, and shows us the way we should traverse. The words of the Master are alive with His spirit. Every word of God is sure. There is energy in the living word, like the life that sleeps in the tiny seed. This is a fact to be tested by human experience, and there are millions who can bear witness to it, "Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever."

The Sun Outshone.

"The sun shall be no more thy light by day; neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee: but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory" (Isa. 60:19). This strange prophecy seems to have been momentarily and literally fulfilled in the career of one Saul of Tarsus. To him there appeared a light, "above the brightness of the sun." And that celestial splendor was Christ. But in a still higher sense, this declaration is coming to pass; for the most colossal figure of the times is that same Jesus who was persecuted. John, the witness-bearer, said, "He must increase, but I must decrease." And so all other lights are growing dim, while the true Light brightens.

It can scarcely be questioned that the historic Christ is a nearer and grander figure to-day than at any period since the first century. Criticism has placed us under obligations by clearing away theological mists and cobwebbed creeds, that Christ may shine upon us. Human wisdom becomes foolishness and human personalities grow dim as this process of increase continues. By its marvels in foreign lands, and its irresistible energy of reform in our own land, the gospel is proving more and more the life-giving character of Him who constitutes its story.

Radiant Lives.

But while Christ is the Light of the world, He honors His followers by saying, "Ye are the light of the world." And again, "Even so let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven" (Matt. 4:16). A light is meant not to be gazed at and admired, but to shine. Indeed, if we look at the light, we render it useless. We look rather at that upon which the light is shining. Christ has promised to dwell with us and be in us, and He makes our lives radiant. If you are in darkness, then Christ has been driven out of your heart. Seek again to make your heart His temple, and then as the light by night streams through the many windows of the cathedral, so let Him shine out in loving words, noble acts, and a glowing atmosphere.

A closer fellowship with Jesus Christ is the need of the church to-day. There is darkness all about her, the darkness of ignorance, of vice, of hatred. Let the light shine! But it cannot shine unless it is kindled. How many are without oil in their lamps! Let us look to Him of whom George MacDonald says:

He, who from the Father forth was sent,
Came the true Light, light to our hearts to bring;
The Word of God,—the telling of His thought;
The Light of God,—the making visible;
The far-transcending glory brought
In human form with man to dwell;
The dazzling gone—the power not less
To show, irradiate and bless;
The gathering of the primal rays divine,
Informing Chaos to a pure sunshine!

PRAYER.

O Thou who art Light, shine upon us, and drive away the shadows of sin and the mists of sorrow. The way is dark, the burden is heavy; but Thou canst pierce the deepest gloom and lighten all heavy burdens. We thank Thee for the light that we have already received, in the knowledge of a Savior, Friend; for the Light that is spreading abroad throughout the earth. May it shine more and more, to the perfect day, whose Sun is Christ Jesus the Lord. Amen.

Editor's Easy Chair.

"Here we rest!" Such is the meaning, in English, of the name of the state wherein we now abide for a few days. Perhaps the weary tribes, pushed toward the setting sun by the encroachments of civilization, felt that at last they had found a place where their wanderings might cease, when they uttered the beautiful Indian name we have translated above. But alas for the hope which the word implied! Their rest was only temporary. Ours must be even more so in these parts. Most of us pass through life looking for resting places which we never find until we take our place in "that low, green tent, whose curtain never outward swings." Modifying Pope's lines we might almost say: "Hope springs eternal in the human breast: Man never does but always intends to rest." He always promises himself, in the stress and conflict of life's duties, that, later on, he will take life easier; he will unburden himself and enjoy a little well-earned rest. A few carry out this plan, but the great majority of people never reach the point where they feel they would be justified in laying aside their tasks, or even lightening them, until they are compelled to do so. But "here we rest," for a season, that we may work awhile longer.

The glory of a sunrise is a luxury which most people deny themselves because the sun has a fixed habit of rising early. We have been enjoying the luxury for several mornings in this southern region, under conditions which have deprived it of its disagreeable features. Early rising is not necessary to enjoy the beauty of a sunrise, provided one's bedroom faces the east, and there is no obstruction to the view; and provided further that one has the habit of waking early. It is delightful, on opening one's eyes in the early dawn, to look out at the eastern horizon and watch the glowing white light driving back the shades of the night, and later, taking on a saffron hue, to be changed a little later into gold and crimson bars, and finally into the splendor of perfect day, as the sun, coming forth from his chamber, and rejoicing as a strong man to run a race, unveils his glory to a waking world. It in no way detracts from the enjoyment of this succession of views if the passage between the different scenes is occupied with short dozes, and one gets the beauty of the glowing east mixed up with visions of that glory that is to fill the new heaven and the new earth, when old things have passed away and all things have been made new. It is worth while to see the sun rise occasionally even if one is compelled to go to the country and rise early to enjoy it.

It is high praise of this quiet village in the southland, which, of course, the readers of the Easy Chair identified by our last week's description as Daphne, Alabama, to say that it constantly reminds us of Macatawa Park. Located on the eastern shore of Mobile Bay, southeast from Mobile, which is on the western shore about ten miles distant, and on high ground covered with a heavy forest, it possesses the same combination of wood and water which we have at the Michigan resort. Here, as there, we watch the sunset over the water, but with this difference, that here we can see the dark shore line on the opposite side of the bay, and the sun does not seem to sink into the water as if he were taking his evening bath, as it does at Macatawa Park. Another difference is, the water of the bay at this season of the year is yellow as the Tiber or the Missouri, on account of the Mobile river, formed by the junction of the Alabama and Tombigbee rivers forty miles above Mobile, which carries into the bay its yellow flood and gives color to all this part of the bay. And then the timber here is different. The magnificent live oaks and magnolias—the largest we have ever seen anywhere—are of course wanting in the northern landscape. But here as there the pine—the most unsectional, perhaps, of all the trees—abounds, and its splendid groves back of the town on the upland look as if they might furnish masts for the shipping of the world.

But as a matter of fact these pine forests are being devoted to a more humble service than furnishing masts to bear the sails of the world's commerce on the high seas. Millions of these tall, straight pines are being "boxed" or tapped, as the sugar trees are, and the sap from their veins is used in the manufacture of turpentine. We have nothing to say against turpentine. The truth is our old-fashioned mothers have more confidence in that simple remedy as a cure for a variety of ailments, including cuts, sprains and bruises, than in all the pharmacopœia of modern medicines. But it does seem a pity to see these splendid forests sacrificed on the altar of even so useful a remedy as turpentine, when we remember the price of lumber and the number of houses the world needs. The reason why these pineries are being converted into turpentine rather than lumber no doubt is that it costs less to do it, and that transportation rates do not take away so much of the profit on turpentine as they do on lumber. Of course a large amount of lumber is made from the pine forests in this state, but in this region a much larger part of these forests is being used in the manufacture of turpentine. To be in the midst of these forests, as we have been in the past few days, with no human habitation in sight, and listen to the soughing of the wind through the tops of the trees, like the coming of a distant storm or the roar of a far-away waterfall, gives one a sense of loneliness which scarcely any other situation can equal. It is like returning to primitive conditions, and one can easily imagine himself a pioneer blazing the way for some future civilization.

Daphne, Ala.

One of our preachers is quoted as saying recently that "we no longer look upon God as a distant personage having his throne upon a particular star, as did the men of a century ago," and one of our papers comments upon this as "coming pretty near being Pantheism." It is to be assumed, then, that the editor in the interest of pure theism thinks it necessary to maintain that God is "a distant personage having his throne upon a particular star." The profound knowledge of Pantheism exhibited in this characterization reminds us of a zealous brother who recently identified Buddhism and theistic evolution, and ascribed them both indiscriminately to Kant, Fichte, Schelling and Hegel.

Questions and Answers.

1. What is the substance of Herbert Spencer's philosophy?

2. Where can I get his writings?

3. Did Robert Owen, by the terror of his name, have the sectarian clergy stampeded until Alexander Campbell dared to measure swords with him?

4. Distinguish between an atheist and an infidel.

T. E. Higgins.

1. Mr. Spencer needed about ten large volumes to state his philosophy; we cannot put it in a paragraph. He is an evolutionist.

2. Through the Christian Publishing Company.

3. Robert Owen was a man of wide fame and great ability, which was recognized in the camp of his enemies, but it is probably not fair to say that he had the sectarian clergy stampeded. Mr. Campbell probably answered him more ably than any other man in America could have done at the time.

4. An atheist denies the existence of a God, i. e., of a spiritual First Cause or World-Ground, however defined. An infidel disbelieves the mission and message of Christ, or, broadly speaking, disbelieves in the revelation of God to man, but does not necessarily deny the existence of God. The deists, for instance, were infidels but not atheists.

When a person desires a letter of commendation, is it proper or scriptural to say to the congregation, "Sister B. desires a letter. Any one knowing any just reason why such letter should not be granted, please make it known," stating that if no objection is to be made, the letter will be granted?

A Learner.

In the absence of scriptural precedent, we see no objection to this form.

Some of our churches have adopted the custom of distributing the bread and wine at the same time, the cup following the loaf immediately. Is this right? X.

While we do not approve of attempting to hurry the Lord's supper as if it were a thing to be gotten through with as quickly as possible, the plan mentioned does not seem to us necessarily objectionable. The bread is blessed, thanks are given for the cup, both are partaken of, and the Lord is remembered. Those are the essential elements of what our Savior asks us to do in memory of Him.

1. Is it true "that there is no scriptural authority for giving the right hand of fellowship"; that it is "simply an old custom," one to be approved but which should be called a "hand of welcome"? If so, explain Gal. 2:9.

2. If the Disciples of Christ was the church established by the apostles, then how is it that we find so many other churches, Methodist, Baptist, etc., years before the Disciples were known?

3. How could Alexander Campbell be the founder of the Church of Christ if it was founded by the apostles under the authority of Christ? A Disciple.

1. There is no scriptural precedent for the giving of the hand of fellowship on receiving members into the church, but it is a custom expressing the idea of brotherhood and fellowship, which is eminently scriptural. The "hand of fellowship" in Galatians 2:9 was given to Paul and Barnabas, not to receive them into the Jerusalem Church, but as a mark of approval and fellowship in the missionary work which they were about to undertake.

2. The Disciples of Christ represent, as we believe, a restoration of the essential elements of the primitive church. If the several denominations, representing more or less serious departures from the apostolic model, had not existed before the restoration, there would have been no need for restoration.

3. Alexander Campbell was not the founder of the Church of Christ, nor of any church, but the leader of a restoration movement.

Do you think it would be wrong for a Christian to take an agency for "The Negro a Beast?" L. M. O.

It would be more than wrong. It would be idiotic. The book is stupid and blasphemous nonsense. To "talk it up," as an agent must, one must bid farewell to intelligence as well as conscience.

A pastor, wishing to resign, addresses his letter "To the elders and the church," and hands it to a member of the board to be read at the regular board meeting. Had the board a right to take action on the resignation before submitting it to the congregation? Subscriber.

Yes. The final decision rests with the congregation, but it is better for the board to advise the congregation than for the congregation to advise the board. The action of the board can be considered only advisory, like the report of a committee, unless the board has been empowered to act authoritatively upon the matter.

Explain 1 Samuel 18:10 and 19:9.

S. A. Seat.

The reference is to the "evil spirit from the Lord" which afflicted King Saul after the favor of Jehovah had been taken from him. The subject of demonology is an obscure one. One can either take the account literally as it stands, that an evil spirit was sent upon Saul by the Lord as a punishment, or, bearing in mind the tendency to personification in the ancient writers, one can understand that Saul had an epileptic affliction sent upon him for the same purpose.

Would it be Christlike to prosecute a man who had more faith in God to heal and cause a prayer than he had in doctors and drugs? Would it be Christian to pass such a law as: Those shall not pray for the recovery of the sick, nor help them in any biblical way, for that is contrary to the law of the medical trust? Eddie.

This question is not asked in good faith for information, but as an argument against the enactment of a law requiring medical practitioners to pass an examination in medicine. The passage of such a law restrains no one from praying for the recovery of the sick, but it will, it is hoped, prevent many an avaricious hypocrite from obtaining the money of frightened and credulous sick people under pretense of curing them by prayer, and it will give merited punishment to many a charlatan who makes his superior "faith" a cloak for his abounding ignorance of the human body which he professes to heal and of the laws of nature, which are the laws of God, by which it has been ordained that health shall be preserved and restored.

The NEW CENTURY AND MISSIONS

By Edward Scribner Ames

A glance at the statistics of Christianity for the last nineteen centuries indicates that marvelous things may be expected in the next hundred years. At the end of the first thousand years there were fifty million Christians; at the end of the XVth century one hundred millions; at the end of the XVIIIth two hundred millions; in 1880, four hundred and ten millions. In the XVIIIth century Christianity gained almost as much as in the first thousand years of its history, and in the first eighty years of the XIXth century there was a gain of two hundred and ten millions as against two hundred millions in all the previous eighteen hundred years.

Another phase of the growth of Christianity is seen in the development of the rule of Christian races over the population of the earth. In 1786 36 per cent. of the people of the world were under Christian control, while in 1886, 55 per cent. were so governed. To-day one-third of the inhabitants of the globe are nominal Christians, but they govern two-thirds of the world. It is most significant that the methods of these Christian governments and the condition of the peoples under them are vastly superior to those of non-Christian governments. Since the partition of Africa among the powers there is not a single polytheistic self-governing country of any importance in the world.

This astonishing growth may also be stated in terms of territory. The Christian powers have increased their rule in the last four hundred years from 7 to 82 per cent. of the surface of the globe, while the non-Christian powers have receded from the control of 93 to about 18 per cent. in that period. At present the Protestant nations alone rule about twice as much territory as all the non-Christian nations combined.

The farther a falling body descends, the greater becomes its velocity, and the older missions are, the greater is their rate of progress. Many things indicate a growth in the present century which will speedily enable the church to evangelize, if not to Christianize, the whole world. For instance, the church is convinced of its missionary duty, the methods of getting funds and men and of dealing with the heathen have been discovered, all countries have been opened to missionaries, the Scriptures have been translated into hundreds of languages and dialects, and many other difficulties of beginning missionary work have been overcome. The further development will be much more rapid.

New agencies for evangelizing the world have become operative in recent years and will be wonderfully improved in this century. These means may be classified as secular and Christian. By secular means are meant such as are not directly developed by the church and are perfected without immediate reference to extending Christianity—among these are scientific invention and the predominance of a few languages if not of one universal language. Christianity more than any other religion profits by inventions which facilitate travel and communication, and the shrinking of the world. No other faith fosters so much all kinds of knowledge and achievements, and no other flourishes so well in the midst of these things.

Ninety years ago English was used by a smaller number of people than any other European language; to-day it is used by the largest number. The dominance of the English and German languages is a fact of momentous interest; for the language and literature of these two Protestant nations are steeped in Christian, in Protestant, thought. It is impossible to become familiar with the language and literature of either England or Germany without learning much of Christianity and even of the Bible. English is to-day the language of diplomacy. Several millions of Hindus and Africans, and tens of thousands of Chinese, Japanese and Siamese have come to know and speak this language with considerable ease. It bids fair to become the world-language. Already missionaries are going to foreign fields to preach the gospel in English, thus saving much time and trouble and at the same time reaching a higher class of people.

Within the church itself three tendencies, already well developed, prophesy a great advance in the cause of missions: (1) the progress of Christian union; (2) the better realization of the Christian virtues, such as liberality and love to one's neighbor; (3) emphasis upon the ethical and practical teaching and example of Christ.

Christian union was a very essential condition in the mind of Jesus for the evangelization of the world. The churches all feel the importance of this problem now as never before. But the union most likely to come first will be one of co-operation and federation for practical undertakings such as the purification of municipal life at home and the apportionment of fields of labor abroad. Both of these ideals are already acted upon, and when Christian workers have gotten acquainted with each other and have seen the good fruits of their united labor they will be less and less solicitous about denominational differences. Already the missionaries themselves, as in Japan, have gone far beyond the home forces in the realization of union. The full appreciation of the saving of money and effort and the relief of foreigners from the entanglement of worn-out theological disputes has not yet dawned upon the religious world. The Disciples can argue union better than any other religious body. When they learn to practice it as well as they theorize about it, then they will make great contributions toward the missionary conquests of the XXth century.

The second element in the success of the church everywhere will be in its own better realization of the Christian graces. Among these will be a better appreciation of what stewardship of wealth means. No heavier indictment can be brought against Christian countries to-day than to state how they spend their money. In America there is annually spent ten times as much for liquor and tobacco as is spent for all church purposes, and three hundred times as much as is given for foreign missions. What will be accomplished when America has become Christianized enough to give for religious purposes as much as it now gives to the saloon?

The contact of peoples and the means of communication reveals to the world not only the ideals but the actual conditions of Christian lands. How much are the Christian doctrines of purity, unselfishness, neighborly love, not to speak of honesty, fidelity and courage, exemplified in the daily life of Christians? The heathen are enabled to know that it is not all smooth sailing with us at home. Perhaps a knowledge of our personal, civic and national life would lead them to think that we had gone abroad with our religion because we could not do anything with it at home. Before the greatest results therefore can be achieved in missions, those who send out missionaries must more completely embody the life and character of the Savior whom the missionaries preach.

The motive and method of missionary work in the new century will be more ethical and Christian and less mechanical and external. This will apply both to securing support from the churches and also to the work in the field. It has been customary to talk about the heathen and to them as though they were utterly lost without the missionary's message. Is God the God of the Jews only? Is he not the God also of the Gentiles? Has he not written his law in their hearts, and given them a conscience which bears witness? No man can read the sayings of Confucius or of Buddha and the representatives of other great religions and fail to find something good, something God-given, in them. If you say the people do not live up to them, then you have only said what applies to Christians, too. Because these systems of religion are not as good as Christianity, are they, therefore, totally bad, any more than Judaism is wholly wrong because it is not the best? The policy of Paul at Athens is not a bad example to follow. He began as every tactful missionary will do, with the religion at hand, starting from the gods already worshiped and the literature familiar in order to lead the way to Christ. Christianity was immediately and primarily the fulfillment and the completion of the Jewish religion, but it is also the climax and perfected goal toward which every other world religion strives.

The character which a religion develops in its adherents is the supreme test of its value. It is because Christianity, even very imperfectly followed, makes better men and women, better homes, schools, laws, business and industrial conditions, that it is sure to triumph over all other religions. That triumph will not exclude, but rather comprehend and fulfill completely, the best elements of those religions.

This ethical conception of salvation, along with other conditions, will change the nature of the appeal to churches for the support of missions. Heretofore missions have rested upon vague ideas regarding the lands and peoples to be reached. Mystery and romance have vied in gaining contributions for a very remote and unknown work. To-day every one reads of the history, customs, peoples of China, India and the islands of the sea. Commerce and war have opened the eyes of millions of Christians to the conditions abroad. It is less possible than it was even ten years ago to "galvanize a congregation into temporary enthusiasm by an exceptionally thrilling missionary address." But all missionary enterprises have gained immeasurably in being conceived as very sane, practical and really fruitful. All missions are coming to have the attraction that has always attached to home work, because the whole world now stands so close to us.

On this account missionary evangelization will be supplemented more and more by pastoral, and particularly by educational, work. It is a significant fact that there are to-day so many mission schools, ranging from kindergartens to well equipped colleges. Only by the slower but more efficient instruction of childhood and youth can the ideals and principles of Christianity be made really effective and permanently fruitful. Because of these things, because of the momentum which Christianity has gained through the centuries, because of the demonstration of the possibility of missions and the best methods by which to promote them, because of facilities of travel, communication and the scientific comparisons of religion, because of the deeper Christian life and consecration which comes with the ethical interpretation of the gospel, because of all these things, the great day is at hand when the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea.

Robert Graham.*

"A prince and a great man is fallen this day in Israel."

"He came to his grave in full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in his season."

It is with feelings of infinite sorrow, and a deep sense of personal loss, that we come to lay this tribute of love on the grave of our old friend, pastor, and teacher. He has gone, it is true, beyond the reach of either praise or blame. Still we must give some public expression to the feelings of affection, honor, and adoring gratitude with which his name and memory will ever be held by the members of this church, which he planted, and to which he ministered in holy things for fourteen years. The most fascinating subject that can engage the attention of a thoughtful mind is the study of the life and character of a great and a good man in an important period of the world's history. History is God's story told in the lives of men and women who have come upon the stage of life, acted their parts in the great drama, and passed out into the infinite and the unknown. Aristotle defines a man as a hunter after truth. A greater than Aristotle said: "I came to bear witness to the truth." The life of Jesus of Nazareth is the most luminous illustration of the religion he came to teach. Next to that of the Master, the life of an intelligent and devoted disciple is the most radiant testimony to our holy religion.

Such a lesson is the life of Robert Graham, in whose memory this service is held. He lived through three-fourths of the most wonderful century in the world's history. He was never an idle spectator in the drama of which he was a part. With busy brain and heart and hand he was an important factor in the religious and educational work of his adopted country. This day are these things mentioned as a memorial for one whom we can no longer see, but will ever love.

At his birth in Liverpool—in sight of the pulsing waves of the beautiful Irish Sea—nature and fortune conspired to make him great. In his veins flowed gentle blood. He had the instincts and the traditions of the Anglo-Saxons—a strangely gifted and restless people who, like the Greeks, thirst for the horizon! His father was a sea captain. Robert, when a lad, sometimes went with his father on long voyages. This experience was both an education and inspiration to his active mind and eager heart. They that go down to the sea in ships, who do business in great waters, these see the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the deep. To use the language of Mr. Blaine on a great occasion: "He looked out wistfully on the ocean's changing wonders; on its far sails whitening in the morning light; on its restless waves rolling shoreward to break and die beneath the noonday sun; on the red clouds of evening, arching low to the horizon; on the serene and shining pathway of the stars." In all these he read a mystic meaning which made on his young mind and tender heart an ineffaceable impression. He never lost his love for the sea and for travel on great rivers. He says in one of his graceful letters: "I have preached on two oceans, the Gulf of Mexico, the Caribbean Sea and on many rivers."

At the age of five years he came with his father's family to New York city which was his home until he was thirteen. On the streets of this great town he saw strange sights and heard strange sounds. He also looked on the stately ships from every clime that had found this haven under the hill and were resting at anchor in the peaceful bay.

He finally went to Pittsburg, Pa., where he attended the public school; and, like Saul of Tarsus, was trained to an honorable and useful handicraft. Following the example of his Lord, whose he was and whom he served, he became a carpenter. He was by nature as well as by choice a builder. God designed him, however, to work on finer material and for higher ends than any that ever engaged the attention of the greatest architect that ever built a palace or a temple.

A visitor to St. Paul's Cathedral in London said to his guide: "Where is the monument to the architect of this structure?" "Look up and around," said the guide, "this whole building is the monument to Sir Christopher Wren!" Lift up your eyes and look over the world to-day, and you will see men in every quarter of the globe whom President Graham prepared for the lives of usefulness they are living. For fifty years he was the presiding officer and teacher in some of the leading institutions of learning in this country. Robert Graham taught both by example and by precept. He was the best model for a young man who wanted to live for high aims and high issues and spotless integrity.

"His words were bonds, his oaths were oracles—
His love sincere, his thoughts immaculate,
His tears pure messages sent from his heart,
His heart as far from fraud as heaven from earth."

The event that finally changed the whole course of his life, and made his name known in many lands, was his entrance into Bethany College. Mr. Graham says of this interesting experience: "Shortly after the expiration of my apprenticeship, I was induced to go to Bethany, Virginia, to work upon the college then in course of erection, though occupied in part both by professors and students. I began my Bethany life on the first day of January, 1843. In compliance with Mr. Campbell's wish, I entered the college till the weather would allow labor to be resumed on the building. On the following commencement I represented one of the societies of the college. That was, I suppose, the turning point in my life, for after working on the college building during vacation, Mr. Campbell insisted that I begin a regular course of preparation for the ministry, proposing to furnish whatever means were necessary to that end." He had the grace and good sense to accept the generous offer of the Sage of Bethany, and the world knows the result.

After graduating he turned his face toward the southwest. That fact meant much for the cause of Christ in this state, as the journey of the Apostle Paul from Troas to Philippi did for Christianity in Macedonia. His first great work was the planting of this church at Fayetteville, Ark., which at once became the centre from which the light of the gospel radiated into the regions around.

Speaking of this church fifty years after it was founded, when it had been tried by varied experiences, both in times of peace and in times of cruel war, he said: "Out of a wide acquaintance with the Disciples, I know of no church that has done more good for the cause of Christ, according to its ability and its opportunity, than the church in Fayetteville." He says further of his experience here and its influence on his own life and destiny: "It molded my character as a minister of the gospel, and laid the foundation of my usefulness in after years." These are tributes to himself as well as to this church that he started on its long career of usefulness. "Like priest like people" is a true old saying. He was not only a great preacher, but also a great teacher. His work in Arkansas College was felt through the whole state. It gave the town prestige as an educational center. This made it an easy matter for Fayetteville to secure the State University when the time came to select a location for this great institution of learning. The splendid school on yonder hill is largely the result of Robert Graham's work in Fayetteville.

President Graham says: "Of all my ministerial life, perhaps that in Arkansas was marked by the greatest trials and triumphs, and, it may be added, the greatest enjoyment. While my home was in Fayetteville, my labors extended to most of the state, and that little mountain city, the church and the college established there, and the influence of both, were felt and acknowledged, not only through the whole state, but in Missouri, Texas and Louisiana, and the regions beyond." He left his impress upon the affairs of state as well as on the church. His work was done in quiet ways. The greatest forces move through silent courses. Measured by the standard of the Sermon on the Mount, Robert Graham was both great and rich. His was the greatness and the glory of service. He was rich in spiritual treasures. These never take wings and fly away. "How much did he leave?" asked one man of another as they were talking of a millionaire whose death had been announced in a morning paper. "All he had," was the solemn and suggestive answer. One who is rich in faith and good works, as was our venerable brother, takes all his possessions into the better life.

President Graham's disposition was singularly sweet, affectionate and confiding. His heart was tender as a woman's. His benevolent face, and large, wondering blue eyes were such as won the love and respect of women and little children. No gentler man ever graced the circle of a court. To say or do a harsh thing gave him nights of solitude and sorrow. His character was molded after the model of Saint John, the disciple whom Jesus loved. In physical stature he was rather below the medium, but compactly built. His discourse was stately and strangely attractive. The first sentence would draw a congregation still as death and he would hold the attention without flagging till the end. His thought was chaste, his delivery faultless, his spirit such as to suggest that he had been with Jesus. He was a master of assemblies, and swayed the listening multitudes with the fervor of his eloquence even as the pulsing tides obey the changing moon. Both in personal appearance and in the manner of preaching there was a striking resemblance between President Graham and Dr. Charles F. Deems, who was pastor of The Church of the Strangers in New York, many years. Any one who ever heard either of these gifted men could never forget either the speaker or the theme. Mr. Graham excelled every other man in the beauty of his autograph letters. They are perfect models of this almost forgotten art. He did more correspondence with friends in every part of the world, perhaps, than any other man whose life was so filled with daily toil. This was the chief reason that he never did more writing for the religious press. He took more pains in the writing of a letter to a friend than most writers do in an article for a public journal.

He says of his ministry in West Virginia and the border states: "It was spent mostly among the poor, with but little compensation, long and laborious journeys, much exposure through swamps and over mountains, by day and by night."

While visiting in his old home in Pittsburg, where he was converted and began his career as a Disciple of Christ, the summons came.

He died at the home of his niece, Mrs. H. A. Spangler, in Bellevue, a suburb of Pittsburg, on Sunday, Jan. 20, at high noon. He was conscious till within two hours of the end. He gave directions concerning the funeral services, even selecting the text and one of the hymns. The Scripture he wished read is a passage in the Savior's last discourse uttered in the seclusion of the upper room after the shadow of accented death had fallen over his soul: "Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also." On this promise—a pillow soft and satisfying—he rested his dying head, and passed peacefully into the sleep of death!

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

In my letter of February the seventh I said that the report of the Ecumenical Missionary Conference can be obtained from A. McLean, Cincinnati, O., and that the price of the two volumes is one dollar. When I wrote this I did not tell the truth! The book cannot be obtained from A. McLean. The price is not one dollar. The price of the report is a dollar and a half. I did not mean to lie about this. I cannot imagine in what way or by whom I was misled in this matter. Now, please, do not conclude from this incident that I am a member in good and regular standing of "the Ananias and Sapphira Society." I am not a member of that association, nor do I belong to "the Amalgamated Association of Newspaper Liars." I have no connection whatever with that or any similar organization. When I indulge in prevarication I do it on my own hook and as a free-born American citizen. No person other than myself is to be held responsible for my blunders.

I obtained my copy of the report of the Ecumenical Missionary Conference from A. McLean, Cincinnati, O., and I supposed that any other person in the United States could obtain the book from the same person. I regret to learn that the Foreign Christian Missionary Society does not sell the book. There are persons who would buy and read it if they could buy the book from our missionary society in Cincinnati. It doubtless would increase the labors of our secretaries and their helpers if they would attempt to supply the brotherhood with missionary literature; but it would pay in an increase of interest in the work and of contributions to its support.

Prof. H. L. Willett, of the University of Chicago, recently paid Colorado a visit. He spent a week in Pueblo with the Central Christian Church, of which Charles S. Early is pastor. A despatch to the Denver papers spoke of his reception by students of the Bible in Pueblo as an "ovation." This is a compliment to the good people of Pueblo as well as to Dr. Willett. The people of any city honor themselves when they give enthusiastic attention to such a Bible teacher as H. L. Willett. We are getting ready for him in Denver. The manifestly increasing interest in the study of the Bible is one of the encouraging signs of the times.

R. A. Schell is the vigorous young pastor of the Church of Christ at Hebron, Neb. He is also president of the Christian Ministerial Association of the state of Nebraska. He is himself a diligent student of "the Old Book," and is zealously engaged in promoting Bible intelligence. He is arranging for a "Summer Ministerial Institute," to continue three weeks in the month of July, at Cotner University. Prof. C. A. Young has been engaged to deliver two lectures daily, four days in the week, during the institute and state meeting. The lectures will be on the following subjects: "Hebrew Prophecy, from the Exodus to the Exile;" "Book Studies in the Bible;" "Studies in the Life of Our Lord;" "Two Biblical Masterpieces" (Isaiah and Romans); "The Minor Prophets," and "The Poetry of the Bible." This general program of the Disciples of Christ in Nebraska is worthy the attention of preachers and Bible students in other states.

I have received an "outline program" of the "Pan-American Bible Study Congress" which will meet in Buffalo, N. Y., July 17-31, 1901. The purposes of the congress are stated in the words following:

"1. To conduct a carefully planned series of meetings during the period of the Pan-American Exposition for the discussion of principles and methods of Bible study and Bible teaching.

"2. For a fair and just comparison of the various plans for Bible study now in operation, each to be considered strictly upon its merits, without fear, favor or prejudice.

"3. To provide a platform upon which all who love and revere the word of God may freely exchange views for the betterment of Bible study, with absolute freedom of expression within the appropriate limits of such an occasion.

"4. To arrange for the exhibition and comparison of the various material and appliances that represent the most progressive plans for Bible study.

"5. To secure from every available source and in uniform style for publication, the statistics and such details of methods as will properly set forth American methods of Bible study and the results gained in comparison with those of other countries."

The congress will be non-partisan, nonsectarian, and non-ecclesiastical. Its aim will be strictly educational.

How does this strike you? It commends itself to me as an important step in the right direction. The time, place and occasion are auspicious for such a congress. More permanent and far-reaching good will probably result from this "Bible Study Congress" in Buffalo than came from "The Congress of Religions" in Chicago in '93.

Uncle John Sutton entered into the possession of life eternal this, Monday morning, Feb. 18. His end was peaceful and painless. Uncle John was the real founder of the South Broadway Christian Church. He had accumulated $25,000 or $30,000. He gave all to the church. But for the liberality of Uncle John it is probable there would be no South Broadway Christian Church in Denver. He was tenderly loved and cared for by those whom his bounty had blessed. He died at the home of Bro. and Sister W. H. Kerr. He was with them not more than ten days. He was stricken with paralysis after he went to their home. From the first shock he rallied; but last Friday he was again stricken and remained unconscious until he passed from the sad experiences of earth to the infinite joys of his eternal home. I have never seen a congregation more deeply moved than was our church yesterday morning when I made known the condition of Uncle John and that we would probably see his face no more. Bro. Sutton was about eighty years old. He came to Colorado from Ohio many years ago. Chancellor W. B. Craig is the man to tell the story of Uncle John's liberality.

Just as this letter is ready for the mail a message comes to me by post, that J. H. Pickerell is dead. This sad message comes from his sister, Mrs. A. E. Edwards, Buffalo, Ill. For almost forty years I knew J. H. Pickerell, and loved him. He was a noble man. A few weeks ago he was in Denver and worshiped with us in the South Broadway Church. The simple announcement that he was a brother of Mrs. W. B. Craig, the wife of a former pastor of the church, was enough to secure for him a most cordial reception. How glad we were to see and greet him. How happy he was that morning! Little did any of us think that this was a farewell reception to our brother. J. H. Pickerell was true to the Christ and his church from boyhood. With what enthusiasm he talked to us about the New Year's Christian Union meeting in the Christian church in Springfield, Ill., his home. That meeting gave him joy beyond expression. But his work is finished. It was well done. He now enjoys the reward of a well spent life. The Lord be praised for the hope of the gospel.

IV. The Creative Powers Exemplified

The belief that man and other distinct families of living beings originated in immediate and separate creative acts, is not always rejected for the same reason. Some do so because they cannot believe in the existence of a Personal Creator—a Being whom as they say, and doubtless with truth, they do not know. This class was never large and is now becoming very small.

Another and much more numerous class believe in a Creator, and think they attribute even more honor to him by denying distinct and successive creations, and postulating instead, the law of development, which, as they assume, the Creator imparted to primal matter when he had made it, and then retired—leaving to this law to do all that through the ages had yet to be done. In process of time—perhaps a few millions of years—a little of the primal matter was developed by force of this law into the lowest form of life, which increased and multiplied through other long ages, till at length the same law developed, out of some of these lowest, the parents of a form of life a little higher. Again, after more millions of years, the same process was repeated with a few of these. And so on and on, to the next higher and then the higher still, and the next above, and the next—on and on, till at last man, the very highest, was reached. He too was developed, not created, save in the creation of the original matter—developed by the independent operation of the law which had been in the beginning stamped upon matter.

Others modify this extreme doctrine, rendering it less objectionable to common sense and less offensive to the religious sense. These hold that God did not retire after he had enacted the law of development, but perpetually remained with it, giving it life and power. This view brings the Creator a little closer to us, and to that extent is preferable to the other which places him beyond the reach of personal communication with him. This latter view, too, is conceivably true. We so understand his relation to the laws of nature, that they are but expressions of his unchangeable character and will. Consequently, to us they are laws—settled, proved, demonstrated—we can always count upon them as immutably the same and uniform in their action. Furthermore, under the same conditions they always act. We should hardly speak of the law of gravitation if the so-called law acted only at rare and uncertain intervals. We expect the laws of light and heat and electricity and the rest to be constant—acting just as certainly and with the same effect to-day as they did yesterday and last week and last year; and this because they are laws. But what has the "law" of development been doing all these many years? We have not heard of a single instance attributed to its operation for a long time. Still, the materials have been abundant—animals of all sorts, higher in the scale and lower, beasts and birds and creeping things and fishes. And yet it has been thousands of years since we have had even a supposed case. It seems that this "law" has retired from business. And that is strange—for a law! for a law of nature!

Some of us have been led to believe that when the Creator has had ends in contemplation which were above the realm of physical nature and beyond the reach and operation of its laws, he has sometimes acted independently of them—accomplishing his purpose either immediately, or through the instrumentality of some higher law which may be natural in the upper sphere, but which, here below, we cannot discover or understand. To us, therefore, such works are wonders. We call them miracles. But being performed under the conditions above stated, they do not seem to us unreasonable, nor, being properly attested, incredible. They rather appear as the necessary and to-be-expected links connecting the lower with the higher sphere. But our religion has never called upon us to give credence to anything so stupendously miraculous as the apparent suicide, or at any rate, the suspension for ages, of a law of nature. It is prodigious. It is paralyzing!

We come back, then, with increased confidence to postulate creation by a personal Creator as the most reasonable explanation of the existence of the world and all things therein. Unfortunately, this doctrine is unwelcome to many, solely, as I think, in consequence of the inadequacy and grossness of their conception of the creative process. No one now, I suppose, entertains an idea so distinctly "statuesque" as that given out by the negro preacher, who, in describing the creation of Adam, represented the Lord as collecting his clay, mixing up his mortar into the proper consistency and then with his hands carefully molding and shaping it into the right form and size, "untwel, at las', finally, it was all finished, smooth an' nice, an' de Lawd sot him up agin de fence to dry—and so dar was his man!" This is an extreme case. What I refer to is something very different. The picture before the mind may not be distinct. Indeed, it is more likely to be undefined and shadowy; and we attribute this to our ignorance—to the fact that we do not know precisely what was done, nor how it was done. Still, we may have some sort of visualized conception, if I may so call it—an idea that though we cannot clearly discern the process with the mental eye, still it was something visible, and if we had been present in any case we could have seen it and noted it and described it. And it is the thought of this sort of ungodlike mechanical work that some seek to escape by taking refuge in the mysteries of development or evolution. Happily for the believer his New Testament is at hand; and it records in detail instances, not only of new creations, of which I spoke in a previous chapter, but also of physical creations; and these can hardly fail to give us a correct and worthy conception of the whole creative process.

We take up the creation of wine, as recorded in John 2:3-11, and carefully observe what was done and what was visible in the doing of it. We note the following particulars:

1. That Jesus made no parade or display and gave no manifestation of effort or exertion in doing the work, which seemed easy and natural to him, and to be accomplished as a sort of matter-of-course.

2. That he made the wine out of something already in existence—just as we saw in the new creation.

3. That he chose for the basal matter of this creation, not a solid nor a gas, but the one natural substance which approached nearest to wine—which at any rate was like it in the essential quality of liquidity.

4. That the only action visible in the case was that of the servants openly filling the water pots with water at his command, and after a few moments drawing from them and bearing the draft to the governor of the feast, who immediately tasted it and to his surprise found that it was wine, the best of wine. It was not water—the old had passed away, and its place had been taken by something entirely new and essentially different—different in taste, appearance, properties, constituent elements, and in its effects. Of course there was still water in it, for it was genuine wine, and there is water in all wine.

We are obliged to concede that this was an immediate work, a miraculous work and that it was done by Jesus—a creative work that attested his divinity and manifested forth his glory. It was a God-work of creation, at which we have been virtually present and looking on. And what have we seen? Not, of course, the creative force going forth and acting—for no force can ever be seen save in its effects; nor have we seen so much as the putting forth of a finger by the mighty worker—for he did not touch the water. He simply stood apart, undemonstrative and calm, as if conscious of his divinity and power. And it was in that serene composure that the work was done, and so quietly and unostentatiously that at the moment it was not seen or known that anything had been done. And in fact, what was done? For he did something: "This beginning of miracles did Jesus." We are obliged to conclude that he simply willed that the water be made wine and it obeyed its Creator.

If now we apply the luminous doctrine here taught to the creation of man, as pointed out in the preceding chapter, it should remove from the mind, on the one hand, all ground of opposition to it as being a special creation, and on the other, all offensiveness from the idea that it was a creation whose basal matter was some highly organized but still vastly inferior animal. In believing this latter, one does not experience any feeling of personal degradation, as he must when he thinks of such animal as his ancestor—his blood kin—from whom he has descended in a direct line by natural generation. On the contrary, he recognizes, as coming between himself and that animal, the direct and personal intervention of a Creator, absolutely divine and infinitely exalted; and it is in him alone that he finds his first and true Father, whose image and likeness he bears as his own peculiar and pre-eminent distinction.

He may believe, as I most certainly do, in the law of evolution. He sees it operating before his eyes every day. For example, he sees that the original dog has been developed under this law into many kinds of dogs—the bull, the poodle, the greyhound and the rest; but he notices that the law of development has never carried one of them beyond the dog line. From the lowest to the highest they are all dogs and nothing else. And what is remarkable, they all recognize and treat each other as dogs. Here we see the limit which its divine author prescribed to the operation of the law of evolution. Under favoring conditions it can evolve all the dog and all the kinds of dog that are latent and undeveloped in the dog nature. But that is the end. By a divine and irreversible decree it can go no further. By no possibility and in no assumed length of time could it, out of the dog, evolve a sheep or a goat or a monkey or a man. These are distinct creations, each of which is confined to its own level of existence—each has its law of development, but limited in its operation to the same level—and never even once, so far as known, crossing over to another and higher level. This law of development is a law—patent to everybody. The vast array of facts with which eminent scientists seek to give plausibility to their theory of evolution go really and only to the extent of supporting this law of development, not theirs. Until they find the bridge that crosses the gulf lying between two distinct species of living creatures, a bridge over which the law of evolution could convey one species into another, it may be a question whether it is the man who accepts or he that rejects the theory, that has—to quote from the former—the "untutored mind." They tell me that I shall be obliged mentally to cross this gulf or be considered an ignoramus and a weakling. This consequence seems probable, but nevertheless I shall wait for the bridge! Perhaps a few persons may agree with me that the facts of the living creation are explicable upon an hypothesis consistent with the word of God, and with his manifest and declared purpose as revealed in the higher spiritual sphere; and showing that the eternal past harmonizes with the divine processes and most blessed human experiences of the bright and gracious present. But I shall pursue this special line no further. If I have succeeded in making my thought clear, and presenting it in proper spirit, I am content. It will doubtless be received with all the respect and consideration that it merits, be it much or little. And so I leave it with the reader, to be accepted, modified or rejected, as his own intelligence may determine.

A Century of Dishonor.

By W. J. Wright.

I refer, not to our treatment of the American Indian, for under the above title another has set forth "the oppressor's wrong" as practised upon "Poor Lo"; I refer to the manner in which the Church has treated the great commission, the Lord who gave it, and the heathen world which is suffering in consequence.

It is granted that the century just closed was one of missionary enterprise, and that more was done in behalf of world-wide evangelization in the past one hundred years than in the dozen preceding centuries. That, however, is due not to the fact that we did so much, but rather that they did so little; not that we did so well, but they so poorly; not to our consuming zeal in this divine enterprise, but to their utter negligence and indifference.

The eighteenth century rediscovered the great commission and gave it as a sacred heritage to the nineteenth; God proceeded to open doors and break down barriers; steam annihilated distance, and electricity joined together far distant lands; continents were explored, languages learned, the Bible translated, and a highway prepared for the entrance of our God.

In view of these magnificent opportunities and her boundless wealth, the Church has done but little short of covering herself with dishonor. The bulk of her membership have acted as if the commission embraced nothing more than the local neighborhood. "All the world" is clipped and pared so as to fit within their physical horizon; and "every creature" includes those in the same township or ward. We expend upon the erection of one house of worship enough money to erect five good buildings; we support at home one preacher to every hundred or so of our membership, oblivious of the fact that we support but one ordained missionary for a hundred thousand or so; we know of two lost souls in our neighborhood, and so near our eyes do we hold them as to shut out the vision of two millions in heathen lands; we pay vast sums to have precentors, prima donnas, quartettes, and choruses render music which Hermes himself cannot interpret, but fling our coppers into offerings for sending abroad the gospel, "whose music is the gladness of the earth."

The above contrast is confined to religious matters. Bring into view what we expend in luxuries and extravagances annually. Plenty of money even in "hard times" for what we want; very little money in prosperous times for what the Lord commands us to do. More money is spent for ice cream each summer in America than is raised in the entire year to evangelize the world. With our professions of loyalty to Jesus Christ, our open Bibles, our knowledge of the great commission, our vast wealth, our vision of hopeless millions, our easy access to them, our acquaintance with their languages, customs and religions, the latter of which are seen to be in a state of decay, with the providential openings and opportunities of reaching them with the gospel, we have no reason to feel elated with our success. Our efforts are unworthy of us. Our negligence is a reproach to us. Our playing and trifling with this, the chief work of the Church, is a disgrace to us. In short, we have closed a century of dishonor. But a new century is upon us, and

"What greater to man can belong
Than the right to redeem in the future, the wrong
To the past?"

Let us raise the $200,000 asked for by our Foreign Society. Let us wipe out our record of dishonor, and usher in his blest eternal reign!

Japan's Great Need.

By C. S. Weaver.

Japan with its 45,000,000 people is a great nation. To the thoughtful observer signs of wonderful progress are apparent. This small people with small ways are indeed a mighty people. It has only been within the last decade that the most gigantic strides in Western civilization have been made. Japan of twenty years ago is not acquainted with the Japan of to-day. While all this development has been going on there has been a wonderful lack of any true morality. The great danger is that Japan shall become intensely intellectual, and be poverty-stricken in true spirituality. Just such a state has been reached that much uneasiness is manifested; the people are dissatisfied with their idolatry and paganism and are drifting about, not exactly in search of something better, for they do not know of anything better than that which they have. At this stage there can be no better time than now to preach the gospel of the Son of God. It fills the heart with sorrow to see how quickly a people take up with evil, and how reluctantly they accept that which would be a blessing. While American civilization is extending rapidly all over the world, so is there much that is not civilization in the true sense of the word. In our English newspaper in the city of Tokyo almost every morning appears on the front page an advertisement of whiskey and as a recommendation of the brand and quality there is added: "The best whiskey that America produces." Hence civilization is not all that Japan needs; indeed if there were less of certain kinds it would be far better. This time may safely be called the "putting off the old and putting on the new period" of Japan. It remains with the church of Jesus Christ to say what kind of garments Japan shall wear in the coming years. Shall the idolatrous worship of Buddha and Shinto continue or shall Jesus Christ be acknowledged "Lord of lords and King of kings"?

It is a sad sight to see the worshipers throng the temples and fall down before the stone gods, or to see those suffering with diseases crowd around the god of diseases and hope to be cured by passing their hands over the dirty old god. They need to know of the Great Physician.

While Japan needs no less of education and the finer arts, yet the greatest need is Jesus Christ. She sorely lacks the higher life without which the strongest government must sooner or later fail. While the professional globe-trotter who passes through Tokyo and other important Japanese cities sees only the very best side of the life of the people yet a very few weeks of close association with the people will convince one that Japan is intensely heathen.

The only remedy for this condition is to preach and live the message which our King has given to his servants. This is not an irksome duty but a high and holy privilege. The call is not so much for dead martyrs as for living ones. Scores of the best men and women should step forth and say, "Here am I, send me." The need is apparent, it is urgent, it is even alarming. The people are here without Christ, the gospel we have. "What shall we do?" We must go or send those who can and are willing to go. The King's business demands haste and his followers must not wait too long before they go in obedience to the great commission.

A Students' Conference in India

By W. M. FORREST, of Calcutta, India

Serampore, India, is a most beautiful city of about 30,000 inhabitants. It lies along the west bank of the river Ganges, about twelve miles northwest of Calcutta. In former days it was a Danish settlement, and did not pass from the control of the Danes to the English until 1845, when all the possessions of Denmark in India were ceded to the East India Company.

When William Carey arrived in India, more than a century ago, he found the representatives of the East India Company so hostile to his intended work that a settlement in Calcutta was impracticable. Thereupon he sought and found shelter and sympathy in the town of Serampore. That is why the place has been made forever historic in connection with the pioneer missionary work of the great Carey and his almost equally great fellow-laborers, Marshman and Ward. And that is why a flourishing Baptist church and school are now found there, and the city is beautified by the noble buildings of Serampore College.

During Christmas week a notable gathering was held at Serampore. By the kindness of the college authorities, the National College Committee of the Y. C. M. A. for India and Ceylon were permitted to use its buildings for the entertainment of the students and the holding of the sessions of the Bengal-Burmah Students' Conference. It was my privilege to attend that conference and to be entertained in the delightful home of Prof. Sommers, principal of the college.

Both the college buildings and the instructors' residences are of stately proportions, and bear little evidence of having stood for nearly a century. The spacious grounds are entered from a shaded highway that skirts the banks of the river. Just across the water may be seen the parks and palaces that make up the suburban residence of the Viceroy of India. The entrance to the college grounds is through massive iron gates that were a present from a former king of Denmark. The grounds themselves are laid out in driveways and paths, and are carpeted with grass, ornamented with gorgeous flowers and crowned with majestic trees. The church building is situated several hundred yards farther up the road on the river bank.

The purpose of the conference was to gather together native Christian students for Bible study, prayer, the consideration of the difficulties and responsibilities of the Indian student's life, and for mutual acquaintance and fellowship. The addresses and studies were given both in Bengali and in English. The sessions were presided over by that noble Bengali Christian gentleman and scholar, Mr. K. C. Banurji, M. A. B. L. More than fifty students from Bengal and Burmah were in attendance. Such was the spirit of the meetings, and the character of the addresses, and such delightful Christian fellowship among the students and speakers, that all of the young men must have gone back to their colleges better fitted to live for Christ amid the temptations of their Hindoo and Mohammedan environment. During the conference quite a number of the men definitely vowed to devote their lives to the Christianizing of Bengal and Burmah.

The most notable of all the sessions of this convention was held on Friday afternoon, Dec. 28. The occasion was the celebration of the 100th anniversary of the baptism of the first Bengali convert to Christianity. The place of meeting was upon the river bank, just in front of the Baptist church and near where the man had been buried with Christ in baptism beneath the waters of the Ganges. Krishna Pal was the first fruits of the labors of Carey and his coadjutors. Who realized at that time that just a century hence a company of representative students from various parts of Bengal would be gathered together to celebrate the conversion of their fellow countryman, and to dedicate themselves to the work of taking Bengal for Christ? The service was attended by a few Hindoos, Mohammedans and Brahmas, as well as many Christians. An interesting feature of the meeting was the singing of a hymn, composed by Krishna Pal in 1801, and rendered into English by Dr. Marshman. The following stanzas are a part of the hymn:

"Oh thou, my soul, forget no more
The Friend who all thy misery bore:
Let every idol be forgot,
But, O my soul, forget Him not.

"Jesus for thee a body takes,
Thy guilt assumes, thy fetters breaks,
Discharging all thy dreadful debt,
And canst thou e'er such love forget?

"Infinite truth and mercy shine
In Him, and He Himself is Thine;
And canst thou, then, with sin beset,
Such charms, such matchless charms, forget?

"Ah! no: till life itself depart
His name shall cheer and warm my heart:
And lisping this, from earth I rise,
And join the chorus of the skies."

The century that has passed since Krishna Pal turned from his idols to serve the living God, has been filled with missionary activity in Bengal. Many souls have been led to follow his example, for some time the native Christian community has been increasing at the rate of more than 30 per cent. every decade. It is believed that the ten years just ended will reveal a far higher percentage of growth, when the census returns are in, than has hitherto been shown. But the work is not yet done; Serampore is still a stronghold of Hindooism. Close by the spot where that anniversary meeting was held was seen a holy place containing an image of the god Krishna, and other more revolting symbols of idolatrous worship, with the offerings of their devotees lying about them. When another hundred years have passed, men may have occasion gratefully to remember that such inspiration was gathered by Bengal students at that conference that the Christianizing of Bengal and of all India went forward with rapid strides thereafter. Standing upon ground made sacred by the labors and triumphs of him whose watchword was, "Attempt great things for God; expect great things of God," why should we not hope for the conquest of Bengal by the power of the gospel before the sunset of the twentieth century?

How to Study James, Peter and Jude.*

By J. H. Mohorter.

We are to study four of the seven, commonly called, catholic epistles. They are spoken of as catholic because they are not addressed to any church in particular.

1. In beginning the study of these epistles, try to realize that they are some very old letters that we have just found. Think of them as being written by one who was deeply and tenderly interested in those to whom he wrote and who sought to encourage them and to save them from error. Try to form some idea, from the writer, of the Christian character of the times and the conditions under which it was formed.

2. Think of these letters as being written by inspiration and as having a spiritual application. Try to think of them, therefore, as addressed to yourself, to aid in the same discouragements, to save from the same errors, and in every way to serve you as they did the first reader, the need being the same. Open these letters as though they were fresh from the writer's hand to yours, and they will have a new charm.

If you carry these two ideas with you in this study you will enrich both head and heart.

The Epistle of James.

1. Since the author is not well known, it will help us to understand his letter, if we first learn something about the writer himself. Note first that he was our Lord's brother (Matt. 13:55). He was a doubter before the Savior's death (John 7:5), but the resurrection established his faith (Acts 1:14), and he was granted a special vision of our risen Lord (1 Cor. 15:7). Note that he was a man of great power and prominence in the Jerusalem church. Peter, released from prison, reported to him (Acts 12:17). He presided over the council (Acts 15:13-19). Paul visited him after his conversion (Gal. 1:19) and reported his Gentile work to him (Acts 21:18).

2. Note that it was addressed to Jews, wherever by necessity or pleasure they were living. He wrote as a Christian (1:1), to those who had faith in Christ (2:1), who wore his name (2:7), and who expected his coming (5:7)—to Christian Jews. As the brother of Jesus and the leader in the Jewish Christian Church, the church in Jerusalem, he would have great influence among the Jewish Christians.

3. Now take your tablet and pencil and read this letter through with a view of discovering its purpose. As a suggestion, it was written to rebuke and correct a sentimental, formal Christianity, the form of godliness void of its power.

4. Now you are ready for a closer study. Make an analysis, one that you can easily carry in mind, and then be sure to put it into the mind. Commit to memory a few key passages; for example, 1:12,22; 2:5, 18, and 3:6,17. These will furnish you handles by which you can carry the contents and hardly realize it.

The Epistles of Peter.

What has been said about James applies to the epistles of Peter and Jude.

1. He addressed the same people as did James. Some to whom he wrote had no doubt heard him preach the first gospel sermon. (Compare Acts 2:9-11 with 1 Pet. 1:1.) They therefore had a mutual interest.

2. Note the purpose of these epistles. The brethren addressed were in fiery persecution (1 Pet. 4:12). They were accused of being evil-doers (1 Pet. 4:15,16). The enemies of the cross had brought the name Christian into disrepute so that it exposed its wearers to odium (1 Pet. 4:16). They were written to give comfort and encouragement to these brethren in trial, and to prepare them for greater trials still to come. Note that the second epistle was written to remind them of what he had said in the first (3:1-3).

3. Now, as in James, make a careful analysis of both epistles, noting a similarity in sentiment and commit the kernel verse of each division.

A suggested outline follows:

(1) God's unfailing word gives a living hope by the resurrection (ch. 1); (2) Growth in grace and the endurance of persecution are therefore encouraged for Christ's sake (ch. 2); (3) Council to holy living and conduct in all the relations of life (3:1-12); (4) Christ an example in persecution (3:13-4:6); (5) Counsel to elders and to all (4:7-5:14); (6) The riches of God's promises should lead to growth in the fruit of the spirit (2 Pet. ch. 1); (7) Avoid false teachers, who may be known by their character (ch. 2); (8) Believing in God's fidelity to his promises they should be governed thereby (ch. 3).

The Epistle of Jude.

Treat this as you have the others. Don't fail to note that he is a brother of James (1:1), therefore a brother of Jesus, that he wrote to Jews (note reference to Jewish history), and that he wrote to warn against false teachers (compare 2 Pet. ch. 2), and to defend the faith. While we may not be in danger of persecution as were these disciples, we are in as much danger from false teachers. If with pencil, pad and patience we study these epistles, and pursue the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses, we will be able to give a reason for our hope and "the faith once for all delivered unto the saints" will never lack defenders.

Boston, Mass.

New York Letter.

By S. T. Willis.

The editor of a local New Jersey paper recently wrote this question to a number of noted persons, "What is it to be a Christian?" Among other replies these were given: Dr. Lyman Abbott: "To be a Christian is to be a follower of Christ—not to think something about him, but to appreciate him, love him, try to be like him and trust in the help that comes through him for accomplishing the work which he gives his followers to do." Prof. B. P. Bowne: "It is to live in loving submission and active obedience to the will of God, trusting in his mercy in Jesus Christ." Mrs. G. R. Alden ("Pansy"): "In my opinion it is to love the Lord so much that I shall desire to have him reign supreme in my heart." Marion Harland: "It is to believe in Christ, and as the fruit of this faith, to grow daily into likeness to him and nearness to him, looking to him for counsel, comfort and strength." Prof. C. G. Ames: "One known by his fruits to be a partaker of the divine nature—the ideal 'good man' as described by Christ. One finds in the New Testament no exhortations to be Christian."

Alexander Campbell once said, "To be a Christian is to believe in Jesus Christ as the Son of God and follow him to the best of one's ability."

Dr. Joseph Silverman, rabbi of Temple Emanu-El, New York, took occasion recently to criticise Minister Wu and Prof. Felix Adler in their discussions of Christianity and Confucianism. The Sermon on the Mount came in also for a share of criticism. The Chinese Minister endeavored to make a point in saying that many of the best precepts of Jesus had been uttered by Confucius 500 years before. Prof. Adler said, "Regarding the teachings of Jesus as coming from a wise man, not as the dicta of a Divine Being, they must be held to constitute the most perfect moral system known."

Rabbi Silverman, in speaking of the Sermon of Jesus on the Mount, said: "Blessing and happiness are promised to the poor, the hungry, the weeping; and misfortune to the rich, the wise, the merry and the self-satisfied. Here Jesus erred in supposing that riches were a crime, and that the wealthy were altogether sinful and that the poor possessed all virtues." He said further that "the Sermon on the Mount contains no new principle or teaching until we reach the words 'resist not him that is evil, but whosoever smiteth thee on one cheek turn to him the other also, and if any man would go to the law with thee and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also.' Minister Wu characterized this as 'meekness with a vengeance,' regarding it as impracticable and inapplicable to present conditions; and thought the injunction of Confucius, 'Do not quarrel with those who offend you' is more reasonable."

Dr. Silverman says both are alike impracticable; for the fact is, human nature and ethics are alike based on resistance of all evil, of every injustice. Moses founded his code upon love to our fellowmen. But in matters pertaining to the protection of right to life, liberty and property, the Mosaic civil law was most severely strict. "The principle of non-resistance as presented in the Sermon on the Mount is subversive of all justice. It seeks to abrogate all courts of jurisdiction and human punishment for wrongdoing. It reveals clearly the intention of the Nazarene teacher to separate man from society and established governments. Even the Christian world has never taken this command seriously, and it has for almost 2,000 years remained a dead letter."

"But the point I wish to emphasize is simply the fact which is so often overlooked, that the Golden Rule is not of Chinese nor of Christian, but of Jewish origin. For Jesus says, after stating this rule, 'for such is the law and the prophets.'"

In conclusion Dr. Silverman said: "Moses was the world's first and greatest prophet of true monotheism, of man's brotherhood, of eternal justice and righteousness. He taught and instituted the first democratic government, and it has formed a pattern for all nations. He broke the fetters of slavery and declared that man, being the servant of God, shall be vassal to no man. He weakened ancient polygamy and prepared the way for the purity and sanctity of marriage and home. He foresaw the evils of competition and laid the basis of an ideal social institution that has not yet found its equal."

These words come from one of the most distinguished and learned rabbis in America. Is his criticism of Jesus just in the least?

Mr. Robert C. Ogden, advertising manager of the Wanamaker store in New York, made a stirring address on "Individuality" before the "People's Institute" at Cooper Union last Sunday night, in which he pled for the development of the individuality of men in all the relations of life. The dignity of manhood is illustrated by what a man can do himself; and the man that can plan and execute is sought after in all the walks of life. Mr. Ogden, who has had long and varied experience with business men, told this story to show the man who is lacking in this quality:

A young man in the clothing business went to a friend for advice. "Place yourself under my guidance," said the friend. "Go back and work thirty days. Try to discover a way to improve your employer's business and increase his profits. Then go to him and tell him your ideas." At the end of the month the young man returned and said that he had not been able to think of anything to increase the profits. "Don't be discouraged," said his friend. "Go back and try thirty days more, and see if you can't think of some way to cut down the expenses." The young man again came back and confessed that he had been unable to think of anything. "Well, go back again," said his friend, "and keep very quiet so that you are not found out. The man in the office has to do all the thinking. You have demonstrated thoroughly that you have no capacity."

The same quality is needed to-day in all the churches, in every department of the work. Does not Jesus commend the worldly-wisdom of the unjust steward?

Prof. George T. Purves' Christianity in the Apostolic Age is an important addition to the history of the early church. Dr. Purves is a leader among the moderate conservatives and a scholar whose opinions are listened to with respect even by those who do not agree with them. The first question to be raised in considering any treatment of the Apostolic Age is, what view does the author take of the book of Acts? Does he regard it as absolutely trustworthy history, or does he consider that the narrative is in some degree colored by the writer's purpose of justifying some particular view of Christianity or reconciling elements which co-existed in the church as he knew it? Dr. Purves does not discuss this question at length, devoting only a page or two to "the historical value of Acts," but he takes strong ground that the book is an absolutely reliable historical document. The parts into which he divides the treatment of his subject are: Rise of Christianity in Jerusalem; Early Expansion of Christianity; Judaic Christianity; Expansion of Christianity under Paul; Progress of Christianity to the Close of the Apostolic Age. The author's final estimate of the Christianity of the Apostolic Age lays emphasis upon its unity. He minimizes the differences between Jewish and Gentile Christianity. In spite of the passing diversities of opinion growing out of the fact that, as the church passed out of the bonds of Judaism, some parts traveled faster than others, the total aspect of the church in that age was unified and this unity "certifies that apostolic Christianity was the normal and authoritative exposition of the religion of Jesus." The chronology of the Apostolic Age is treated briefly in an appendix. The author maintains the usual view (opposed by Harnack and McGiffert) that Paul suffered a second imprisonment and was put to death about the year 67. The arrangement of the volume and its general method make it suitable for use as a text-book by those who do not care to go into the antecedent conditions of Jewish and Graeco-Roman society as fully as Fisher's "Beginnings of Christianity," and those who do not care for such detailed critical inquiries and such doubtful opinions as are furnished in McGiffert's "Apostolic Age." The maps are adequate, the indexes convenient and the appended bibliography sufficiently full for ordinary use. (Scribner's. $1.25.)

A book dealing with the history of our language comes to many readers as a great boon. They have shunned the more scientific volumes because an understanding of them requires a knowledge of philology with its confusing terminology. It is, therefore, with pleasure that we note the appearance of Outlines of the History of the English Language by T. N. Toller, Professor of English in Owens College, Manchester, Eng. Professor Toller is a competent scholar in Early English and has shown himself amply able to deal with his subject. The first few chapters treat of language in general, the relationship of different languages, accompanied by numerous illustrations. Then follows a detailed history of our own language from its beginning on English soil, an account of the influence of foreign languages, of the peculiarities of the different periods of development, with careful observations on the changes in grammar. Especially valuable is chapter 11 which shows the beginnings of French influence. The last two chapters deal with the important events of the 15th century, the chief literary works and the characteristics of the language through the 16th, 17th and 18th centuries. The volume is of genuine value to the average student and should be known to every one who is interested in the changes in the English language. It is a happy combination of the scientific and popular treatments of a difficult subject. (Macmillan Co.)

The immediate results of our adoption of a policy of expansion seem likely to find expression in literature as promptly and notably as in the growth of commerce. Not only has there been a flood of more or less reprehensible patriotic poetry, but there has been a new impulse to the writing and reading of books dealing with international affairs. World Politics, by Prof. Reinsch, is one of the best introductions to this subject. It presupposes in the reader no special acquaintance with current history. The most conspicuous characteristic of present day politics is the tendency toward territorial expansion. The spirit of nationalism has been developing for centuries and is a legitimate and necessary factor of human progress, but the undue exaltation of the concept of the nation leads to imperialism and may end in the emergence of one state as the leader of the world, and the reproduction of the Roman empire. The method by which national imperialism operates is essentially machiavelian, not necessarily involving poison, daggars and crude prevarication, but embodying the idea that everything is to be sacrificed to the good of the state. The volume treats especially of the far eastern question and its influence on world politics. The greatest danger of imperialism, the author says, is that it may take our attention from home affairs and thus lead to increased corruption in our domestic administration. It is a book of information rather than of theories and no reader need fear that he will find his political faith violently assailed in it. (Macmillan. $1.25.)

It is perhaps not too late even yet to say a word about Deacon Bradbury, though it has already been before the public long enough for its author, Edwin Asa Dix, to reap a large harvest of that quick crop of reputation which comes from a successful novel. He has won a firm place among the writers who are making genuine literature out of such materials as are lying around loose in any upcountry New England town. The reader is on friendly and sympathetic terms with the Deacon and his wife from the start—a relation which is facilitated by participating in their struggles to get at the real sense underlying the legal verbiage of a mortgage which they are placing on the farm in order to send their boy to college. The story tells of how a father, the Deacon, came to an understanding of his son and learned with much difficulty that the boy was not necessarily exactly like his father and not precisely like the ideal which the Deacon had formed, but, in the words of Mrs. Bradbury, "just like himself and nobody else." (The Century Co. $1.50.)

There was never more practical information about traveling abroad condensed into forty-three small pages than is to be found in Six Months Abroad on $300, by E. H. Kellar. The author and his wife made the tour through Central and Western Europe, Turkey, Palestine and Egypt at an expense of $300 each. The book is not a literary work but a notebook and it gives in detail the expenses of the trip, leaving to the guide books and the more pretentious but less practical books of travel the detailed description of the points of interest. Mr. Kellar asserts that, in spite of the cheapness of the tour, it was not a roughing trip and that the economy practiced involved no real hardship. It will pay any one who is going abroad and cares to get his money's worth to read this account, and it will encourage many to attempt the trip who have hitherto considered it beyond their reach for financial reasons. (Published by the author, Carrollton, Mo. $ .50.)

The story of life on the plains twenty-five years ago with its elements of Indian fighting, buffalo hunting, cow punching and bronco busting, is told in Cattle Ranch to College, by Russell Doubleday. It is not a novel and has no plot except such as is involved in a boy's finding his way from the plains to the college. It is said to be a true story. It sounds true and its many episodes and numerous illustrations give a good picture of western life as it was then. (Doubleday and McClure Co. $1.50.)

President Schurman of the Philippine Commission characterized Dr. Jose Rizal's "Noli Me Tangere" as "the Bible of the Filipinos" and its author as the greatest Filipino that ever lived. It appears in English under the title "An Eagle Flight." (McClure, Phillips & Co.)

Ida M. Tarbell's "Napoleon" which, partly by reason of the readability of its text and partly by reason of the ultra-copiousness of its illustrations, achieved a circulation of nearly 100,000 copies—marvelous for anything other than a novel—has just been published in a new edition under the title "Napoleon and Josephine." The change, as one would suppose, is wrought chiefly by an elaboration of the part relating to the unfortunate Empress. (McClure, Phillips & Co.)

The recently issued catalogue of publications of the University of Chicago Press shows what an immense amount of work the members of the university are doing toward adding to the literature of their several departments. The publications are for the most part technical books, theses and pamphlets dealing with important but more or less minute and hitherto unconsidered points in the sciences, literature, philology, philosophy, economics, pedagogy and theology. It is a noteworthy fact, too, that many of the works whose titles are the most enigmatical and austere to the uninitiated—such as "The Structure and Development of the Sporophylls and Sporangia of Isoetes" and "The Algol Variable plus 17 degrees 4,367 W. Delphine"—are marked "out of print." Somebody must understand them. Luckily the university that can turn out the books can also produce the people to read them.

Flavor of Food Won Her.

"When the landlady told me that the new dish at my plate was the much talked of food, Grape-Nuts, I tasted it languidly expecting the usual tasteless, insipid compound posing under some one of the various names of 'breakfast foods.'

"I am a school teacher and board. Have usually been in robust health, but last spring I had the much dreaded symptoms of spring fever set in with great severity. I could hardly keep at my work and headaches were almost constant. Food had become nauseating and I only partook of any sort of food from a sense of duty.

"My nights were spent in distress. The first taste of Grape-Nuts yielded a flavor that was new and attracted me at once. I arose from the table satisfied, having enjoyed my meal as I had not done for weeks. So I had Grape-Nuts food for breakfast every day, and soon found other reasons besides my taste for continuing the food.

"All of the spring fever symptoms disappeared, the headaches left, my complexion cleared up, and after a supper of Grape-Nuts I found myself able to sleep like a baby, in spite of a hard day and hard evening's work. The food has never palled on my appetite nor failed in furnishing a perfect meal, full of strength and vigor. I know from my own experience of the value of this food for any one who feels strength lagging under the strain of work, and it is evident that the claim made by the makers that it is a brain food is well taken. Please omit my name if you publish this." The lady lives in Hanover, Ind. Name supplied by Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

Our Budget.

—Go or send!

—Make March 3 a great day in your church.

—We hope every church may be in line with a generous offering for the evangelization of the world.

—Let us signalize the first year of the new century by unprecedented offerings.

—The Foreign Society now has 257 missionaries on the heathen field, and a number more will be sent out soon.

—We shall not do our duty if we fail to reach the $200,000 this year for foreign missions. We feel confident the full amount will be realized.

—A LIVING LINK church is one that supports a missionary on the foreign field. We have 13 such churches in our brotherhood. The number no doubt will be increased next Lord's day.

—The church or preacher without an interest in missions is doomed. A larger missionary spirit would be the beginning of a new life with many a preacher, and the beginning of a new era in the history of many a church.

—Send the March offering promptly Monday morning, March 4th. to F. M. Rains, corresponding secretary, Box 884, Cincinnati, O. Be careful to give the name of the church when different from the post office. Send by bank draft, post office order, money order or registered letter.

—Prof. H. L. Willett is giving a series of six lectures, "Book Studies in the New Testament," at the Christian Church in Springfield, Ill., from Feb. 24 to March 1.

—J. P. Lewis, now at Disputanta, Va., has ended his work with the church at Petersburg and is willing to hold a few meetings during the spring and summer for churches within reach of that point.

—Guy B. Williamson, singing evangelist, 915 Aubert Avenue, St. Louis, would like to make dates for meetings during the summer, either with evangelists or with preachers who expect to hold their own meetings.

—Mark Collis, of Lexington, Ky., writes: "Brethren and sisters are cordially invited to attend the congress of Disciples which meets in Lexington, March 26-28. Entertainment will be furnished for those who send their names to the writer."

—The first native Filipino Endeavor Society has been organized in Manila. Its exercises are in Spanish and Tagalog. Another society will soon be organized at Iloilo and the pledge is being translated in the Visayan language. Thus does Christian Endeavor follow the flag.

—N. Rollo Davis has resigned his pastorate at Burlington Junction, Mo., to take effect March 1. He will move his family to Maryville, Mo., and desires employment with churches in reach of there. He will be glad to hold protracted meetings while looking for regular work. Brother Davis is well known in Missouri as an efficient preacher with a good record and should have no difficulty in securing appointments at once.

—The following suggestion in regard to literature bearing upon one of the subjects to be considered at our coming Congress, comes from C. C. Rowlison, of Indianapolis, who is a good judge of books: To those especially interested in the session which is to be devoted to the "Psychology of Religious Experience" I should like to recommend the reading of one or all of the following books: "The Psychology of Religion" by Edward D. Starbuck (Scribner's $1.50); "The Soul of a Christian" by Frank Granger (Macmillan $1.50); and "Spiritual Life—Studies in the Science of Religion" by George A. Coe (Curts & Jennings).

—The little church at Johnston, S. C., feels keenly the loss of its pastor, P. H. Mears, who has gone to the congregation at Dublin, Ga., after eighteen months of hard, sacrificing work.

—E. M. Haile has resigned the pastorate at Sedgwick, Kan., where an excellent meeting by D. D. Boyle has just been concluded, as reported elsewhere, and he is succeeded by C. A. Burridge.

—The new church at Nora Springs, Ia., was dedicated on Feb. 17, by George F. Hall. It is reported that it is a beautiful house, that there were large and enthusiastic audiences and that all indebtedness was provided for.

—The church at Clarion, Ia., of which M. G. E. Bennett is pastor, recently paid a long standing debt of nearly $1,700. R. C. Sargent, of Mason City, and Prof. E. A. Ott, of Drake University, assisted them in a church rally.

—Herbert Yeuell, pastor of Shady Avenue Church, Allegheny, Pa., gave his stereopticon rendition of "The Tragedy of Quo Vadis" recently at Newcastle, Pulaski, Belle Vernon, Monessen, East End Pittsburg and Hazelwood. The papers speak well of it.

—There are two Christian Endeavor societies among the Indians in Oklahoma; one of forty-eight Arapahoes and the other of Cheyennes. The Arapahoes received twenty-one on Decision day and the Cheyenne Society is so large that the list of members is divided and only a part are allowed to speak at each meeting.

—We have a circular of information in regard to the summer school of Drury College at Springfield, Mo. The institution is already widely and favorably known in this part of the country as "The Yale of the West," and those who are interested in the matter of summer schools will do well to write for information to Prof. F. A. Hall, Drury College, Springfield, Mo, The summer session is from June 11 to August 1.

—The new church at Augusta, Ill., will be dedicated on March 3 and Judge Scofield, of Carthage, Ill., will preach the dedicatory sermon. A. L. Ferguson, the pastor, writes that a cordial invitation is extended to all friends who may find it possible to be with them on that day. Those coming from a distance are requested to send word in advance. L. H. Stine, of Quincy, will preach during the week following the dedication.

—The National Anti-treating Society is an organization formed about five years ago to create sentiment against the social use of intoxicating liquors. It is based upon the belief that the use of alcoholic beverages in the vast majority of cases has its motive in a misguided social impulse rather than in a perverted appetite. The treating system is the most pernicious form in which this social idea finds expression. The pledge of the Society binds one to discourage and abstain from the practice of treating. Members of the society assume no obligations other than those contained in this pledge. The president, H. G. Haring, Corner 7th and Diamond Streets, Philadelphia, will be glad to furnish further information and instruction for the organization of chapters.

—I. W. Kimberly, of Brook, Ind., would like to correspond with a church or churches desiring a pastor at a reasonable salary.

—W. H. Fry, of Creal Springs, Ill., would like to secure the pastorate of some congregation. He is 35 years old, has a wife and two children and has had three years in college. Large salary not required, but a parsonage would be a great inducement.

—E. J. Willis, of Henderson, Ky., has been secured as general evangelist for western Kentucky. H. D. Smith, of Hopkinsville, Ky., says of him: "To those who do not know Bro. Willis, it gives me pleasure to say that he is regarded by those intimately associated with the management of our co-operative work in this district as in every way competent and suitable for the place to which he has been called. He is a good preacher, of marked ability, and a man of genial presence." He will assume the duties of his office about March 1. J. W. Gant, who has served the association faithfully for 20 years, will continue as corresponding secretary and treasurer.

—The church at El Paso, Ill., held a jubilee service on Friday evening, Feb. 22, to celebrate the cancellation of the indebtedness on the church building. An address was delivered by M. Stevenson. The pastor, H. H. Jenner, reports that, besides paying a debt of $960, there is money on hand for repairs. The church has been reorganized and its prospects are bright.

—We have received from J. M. Rudy, of Cedar Rapids, an article on the life and work of Brother Nelson A. McConnell, whose death we recently chronicled. The article came too late for publication in this issue of the paper, but will be printed next week. A memorial service in memory of Brother McConnell will be held on March 10 in the Christian Church at Marion, Ia., where he was pastor for many years. A special address will be delivered by a representative of Drake University.

—John G. Fee, of Berea, Ky., whose recent death is lamented by a wide circle of friends, left his daughter about 500 copies of his book on Christian Baptism. It is a well-printed and well-bound book of about 200 pages, giving a strong and clear exposition of the doctrine that scriptural baptism is the immersion of a penitent believer. He dwells at length on the linguistic arguments from the verb baptizo and the prepositions en and eis, the figurative and religious uses of the term, the references in prophecy and the descriptions of individual baptisms in Acts. The book is useful and valuable both as a treatment of the subject and as a memorial of Brother Fee who was a unique character and did a unique work. Neither he nor his work will be soon forgotten. The book may be obtained for $.50 by addressing Mrs. Laura Embree, Berea, Ky. We gladly insert this notice at the request of S. J. Derthick.

—The article by J. H. Mohorter, entitled "How to Study James, Peter and Jude," which appears in the present issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, is the last of the series of articles supplementary to the Bethany C. E. Reading Course in the Department of Bible Study. Those who have read these articles, and still more those who have used them as a basis for systematic study, will agree with us that they have been a most helpful series. It should be borne in mind that the articles were not intended for a mere casual reading, but each is a syllabus to be used in a serious study of the subject with which it deals. In next week's paper we will begin the second series of Bethany Reading Course articles, dealing with the general subject of the work of the disciples. We give here the titles of these articles believing that the bare mention of them will persuade many who have not hitherto taken up this work to do so:

'Should she be received upon her trine immersion and why?'" Will 'One Interested' send me his address and I will try to prove to him that trine immersion is unscriptural, and also that any one of the three immersions to which the lady has submitted is also unscriptural, hence, null and void, consequently she has not received Christian baptism."

Missions the Thought of God.

One Sunday morning, seventy years ago, in a little town in Northern Ohio, Thomas Campbell read for an opening lesson, in the public worship of the church, the first two chapters of Genesis, giving an account of the creation of the world and of man, and the last chapter of Revelation, giving an account of the New Jerusalem; and then, holding up the Bible in his thin, white hands, for he was an old gray-haired man, he said, "If it had not been for the entrance of sin into the world, the chapters I have just read would have been all the Bible we should ever have needed, for all the intervening chapters, which constitute the great bulk of the book, were written to develop the plan of human salvation." It was a striking sight to see, and a striking utterance to hear, and just as true as striking.

The plan of salvation, or God's great purpose to redeem the world in Christ, begins to unfold in the third chapter of Genesis. It was a thought which originated in the benevolent mind of God. And it runs as an increasing purpose clear through the sacred volume from lid to lid—insomuch that the paradise which disappears from view with the fall of man at the beginning of the book, reappears to view with the redemption of man at the end, only that it is now a paradise a hundred times more glorious than it ever was at the beginning.

It were interesting, indeed, to trace the widening of this streamlet as it starts in its course down the centuries. At first it is a mere rill of suggestion, then it widens to a rivulet of promise, now it has become a brook of types and symbols, then a creek of sublime prophecies, and at last it broadens to a mighty river of glorious fact, coursing its triumphant way through all lands and climes and bearing on its broad bosom the destinies of the race.

Or under another comparison it is like a portrait developing under the brush of a master artist. The first rough stroke gives but the faintest outline of the features of the coming Christ—"the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." The second stroke adds new lines of clearness, when to Abraham it is said, "in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." More and more clearly the divine face stands out in the succeeding touch—"the scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor a law giver from between his feet, till Shiloh come." Prophets, priests and kings of the Jewish age by suggestive analogy all lend new distinctness to it. Isaiah adds masterly strokes in his fifty-third chapter. And at last, at last, the four gospels give to us the finished portrait in the full flush of life and strength, in all its divine beauty and perfection, to charm and transform the world.

Now the central idea of all missions is to so expand the divine Christ thus unfolded to us that he may fill the earth. As Dr. A. H. Strong truly says: "The Church is the expanded Christ. The great purpose of missions is to multiply Christ, to reincarnate the Son of God, to enthrone him in the hearts of men, to make all men the temples for his personal indwelling that he may be the first born among many brethren, and that he may fill the world with himself." Missions thus viewed are not only the great thought of God, but a world-embracing Christ is the embodiment of that thought. And both in its conception and realization it is worthy of a God of infinite love. Grasping it in all its glory we may with the same thrill of gladness exclaim with Kepler, as he contemplated one of his greatest astronomical discoveries, "O God, I think thy thought over after thee."

All who help to realize this stupendous purpose of God are workers with him. And as the might of omnipotence is pledged to its fulfillment, they who work to this end are sure of final victory. What inspiration, therefore, in the work of missions. God is working with us and we are working with him. And the result at which we aim, a redeemed race, is as certain to come to pass as that to-morrow's sun will rise. No man on earth works with such an absolute assurance of success as the man who works along the lines of the divine purpose.

I have heard men pity foreign missionaries as the most hopeless and woe-begone of mortals. They needn't. Their pity was never more entirely wasted. There are no more heroic, hopeful and happy men and women on earth than they. Every one of them would say with Livingstone, "Away with the word sacrifice. It is emphatically no sacrifice. Say, rather it is a privilege." The man himself is to be pitied who pities such as these. He has never grasped the faintest conception of what true living really is. And we have two hundred and fifty-seven noble men and women in far-off lands who feel exactly that way about it, who know the joy and sweetness of the truly Christlike life. God bless them, every one. And God bless our churches which are striving to have part and lot with them in this precious fellowship of realizing God's great purpose of saving the world. And God bless our missionary secretaries that they may have the happiness of seeing this great thought of God firing the hearts of our people everywhere and bringing forth abundant offerings to carry on and enlarge the work.

But nature as well as revelation shows missions to be the thought of God. Not a coral island rears its head above the waters of the sea but the winds and waves, as though filled with missionary zeal at its bareness and destitution, hasten to carry to it the evangel of a new life, which quickly fringes it with vegetation and makes it fragrant and beautiful with fruits and flowers. Not a tree or plant but seems to seek for means and methods of sending out its reproductive seed far beyond the boundaries of its own location. The water-maple seed has a missionary wing by which when it falls the winds may whirl it hundreds of yards from the base of the tree. The cherry tree always has a self-appointed army of missionaries in the robins and blackbirds, whose unflagging zeal needs but barest mention. The thistle is provided with a buoyant down which lifts its seed aloft in air and bears it far over the land. Still other seeds have a knack of attaching themselves, like the cocklebur, to some moving object and compelling it, willy nilly, to become its evangelist. It may be the shaggy coat of the setter dog, the inviting hair of the horse's mane, or that most effective of all missionaries for the scattering of earth's seeds, the woolly covering of a sheep's back. Sometimes they even lay hold on human beings to do missionary work for them, and as the Spanish needles and the sticktights fasten securely to them in uncomfortable abundance, how easy to see themselves made the apostles of a new commission, saying, "Go ye into all the world and carry my deeds to the whole creation." In short, one can hardly walk with open eyes in field or forest without seeing at every step some new illustration of the fact that missions are the thought of God. And thus in the simple lessons of nature all around us he is teaching us that the seed of his kingdom, which is the word of God, must be carried abroad in the earth in order to bless and save mankind. But while nature has a multitude of effective methods for spreading its seed far and wide, God's word has only one, the agency of human beings, the lips and lives of redeemed men and women. And may we all bear the solemn fact in mind that, unless we strive to send redeemed men and women bearing this incorruptible seed to the destitute and perishing of our race, the blood of souls will rest upon us, and with it the condemnation of Almighty God in the measure that we might have sent and yet did not.

It is an easily deduced corollary that the supreme work of the church is to carry out this stupendous thought of saving the world, to use all its means and resources, all its time and toil and talent to realize the great purpose on which the divine heart is so firmly set. Our God is marching on to universal conquest. Shall we march with him or shall we loiter behind?

Is there a single soldier enlisted under the banner of our Great Captain who will not bravely and loyally turn his eyes aloft and say,

"Lead on, Almighty Lord,
Lead on to victory;
Encouraged by Thy bright reward,
With joy we'll follow Thee!"

GEORGE DARSIE.

Fire! Fire!!

When that cry sounds how people rush to help and sympathize! And when some fireman rescues a woman from the flames, the streets echo with applauding shouts.

And yet if that woman had perished in the flames it is possible that she would have suffered less than she suffers almost daily from the inflammation which disease has lighted in the delicate womanly organism.

That fire of inflammation can be put out. The gnawing ulcer can be cured. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription not only establishes womanly regularity and dries enfeebling drains, but it heals inflammation and ulcerations and cures female weakness. It makes weak women strong and sick women well.

"I suffered for four years with what four physicians pronounced ulceration and prolapsus of the uterus," writes Mrs. Ada Brooks, of Kirbyville, Taney Co., Missouri. "Also inflammation of bladder and urethra. My case was chronic and complicated. Had several good physicians, but kept getting worse. Had been confined to my bed five months when I wrote to you. I received your reply very soon and then dismissed my physician and began taking Dr. Pierce's medicines. I took eight bottles of his 'Favorite Prescription' and 'Golden Medical Discovery,' and began to get better at once. In two months I could sit up in a chair, and kept getting better. In four months could do all my house work, including washing and sewing."

Dr. Pierce's Common Sense Medical Adviser, paper covers, is sent free on receipt of 21 one-cent stamps to pay expense of mailing only. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

Kentucky News Notes.

W. A. Fite will close his work with the church at Washington, Mason county, on March 1 Besides liberal offerings to missions and benevolences, the church during the past year has built a parsonage and will call a resident preacher soon.

The Orphans' Home at Louisville is making an enthusiastic effort to raise an endowment sufficient to meet the demands of such a Home. There is no worthier work among us than that of looking after the interest of our orphan children. Those giving $1,000 will be permitted to keep one child in the Home continually. We trust the brotherhood will respond liberally to the appeals made by this worthy institution.

We feared, after his resignation at Henderson, that we would lose E. J. Willis from the state, but are glad to know that the Executive Committee has secured his services for the place of general evangelist in the South Kentucky Missionary Association. We predict for him much success in the evangelistic field. His successor at Henderson has not yet been selected.

J. W. Mitchell has accepted the work at Earlington, Morton's Gap and St. Charles. All of these places are in Hopkins county and together form a good field for successful work.

T. J. Golightly, a member of the class of 1901, College of the Bible, has accepted a call to Corinth. He begins his work under favorable circumstances.

The work at Corydon starts off well this year, with J. W. Ligon as the energetic preacher. Bro. Ligon is one of the most popular preachers in South Kentucky. In a recent letter he says: "Last Saturday afternoon a storm struck our house, but it seemed to do more harm than good. A large number of brethren, most of whom were sisters, came down upon us, bringing many things that were calculated to cheer the hearts and strengthen the constitution of a preacher and his family." We dare say such "storms" are never dreaded by any preacher, but on the contrary are always received "with open arms."

The Fort Collins (Colorado) Express in a recent issue contains the following: "Rev. R. W. Elder of the Christian Church, who has been a sufferer from consumption for some time, had a hemorrhage on Sunday and has gone to Denver. It is somewhat doubtful if he will be able to renew his charge here." Bro. Elder was for several years located in Kentucky and has many friends here who will, we know, regret very much to hear this sad news. May God spare his life many more years for work in his vineyard is our earnest prayer.

The announcement that Miss Alice Lloyd, the well-known Principal of Madison Institute, Richmond, will sever her connection with that institution at the close of the present session, will no doubt come as a surprise to her many friends among the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST family. As an educator she has few equals, and under her efficient management the Institute has become one of the very best female schools in the South. A Richmond paper in speaking of her resignation says: "That she should be urged by the trustees to remain is the opinion of the writer and also of many of our citizens. She should have strong financial backing by the Christian Church, under the auspices of which the school is conducted."

Prof. H. L. Willett, of Chicago University, is announced for a series of lectures on "The Beginnings of Christianity" at Richmond, March 10th to 15th. He will no doubt visit other churches while in Kentucky.

Who can beat this record? Bro. J. W. Harding, of Winchester, will be 78 years old in a few months and has been preaching for more than half a century. Last year he attended nearly 400 religious services, traveled nearly 5,000 miles in keeping his appointments, not missing a single one of them, officiated at 19 marriages, 41 funerals, and received 81 members into the churches for which he preaches. This is certainly a wonderful record for a man of his age.

Texas Letter.

It requires a long time to correct some wrongs. One of the earliest and best remembered impressions of my childhood was when my father used to speak of the folly of raising cotton in the South and shipping it to the North to be manufactured, and then having it shipped back to the South, the planter thus, in addition to paying a good round price for its manufacturing, paying the freight on it both ways. If there were no manufacturing facilities nearer the cotton fields this would be all right. But this is not the case. The facilities here are as good as, and perhaps better than, those of New England. It is claimed that there are more than 100,000,000 cotton spindles in the world. Great Britain 45,400,000, the continent, 33,000,000, the East Indies 4,800,000, and of which the United States has 18,600,000 and the South, 6,467,000. The South furnishes about three-fourths of the world's cotton supply, while the United States owns less than one-fifth and the South about one-sixteenth of the spindles of the world. These facts show that something is radically wrong: But the outlook is encouraging, for the number of spindles in the South shows an increase during the last decade of 125 per cent.

Add-Ran University, Waco, has matriculated thirty-six new students since Christmas. Patient and faithful work, coupled with much sacrifice on the part of a few, is at last being rewarded.

Tennessee has passed an Anti-Cigarette Bill. The vote was almost unanimous. Good for Tennessee. When fathers will not do their duty, the state should protect their children. John said to Bill, "Is your father going to flog you for smoking?" "Yes," answered Bill. "When?" "As soon as he gets through smoking his cigar."

In 1850, about five years after Texas became a state, her population was 212,592. Ten years later she had 604,215 people. In 1900 this population has grown to 3,048,710, an increase over the last decade of 36.4 per cent., or more than fourteen times greater than that of 1850. Our land surface is 263,290 square miles. The average population to the square mile is therefore 11.6. If we ever reach the density of population which prevails in Massachusetts, we will have 91,000,000 people. Great is Texas, and great are her possibilities. Come down from the crowded regions where you can have room to grow.

Socialism seems destined to fail in this country. One of the latest evidences of this is found in Georgia. In 1898 about fifty socialists from Indiana and Illinois settled on a 1,000 acre tract of land in Muscogee county. The first year yielded good profits, but the second and third brought losses. The numbers were increased by recruits to about one hundred and twenty, but many were drones, and these drones destroyed the hive in the third year.

Albert Nichols, of Lincoln, Ill., is to succeed R. R. Hamlin, at Plano, and we are glad to have some new blood injected into our Texas preaching force.

J. B. Haston is to preach for the church at Sabinal. What Galveston is to do I know not.

Uncle John Sutton.

In 1870 I became the minister of the church at Alliance, O. Brother and Sister Sutton were members of that church. They were then keeping a restaurant at the railway crossing in the midst of the city. They worked hard and gave close attention to business and lived economically. They were then laying the foundations for the neat little fortune they made which eventually went into the beautiful church house in Denver.

They were mindful to do good as they lived. Two nieces and a nephew, orphaned children, found a home with them and were reared and cared for as their own, and the church received liberal support from their generous hands.

They were among the staunch supporters of the work. Their place in the Lord's house was always filled. Religiously they did their duty. Many hungry ones they fed and helped on their way.

They were good to wait on the sick. Theirs was a religion that was not spoken so much in words, but was eloquently expressed in deeds.

The church at Alliance before my coming and again after my leaving passed through much trouble caused mostly by two preachers of unsavory memory. In these troublous times, the faith of some failed and they fainted by the way and fell out of the ranks. Not so with the Suttons. They never wavered or faltered but held on their way through it all.

Uncle Jack was one of the trustees and at one time when the shepherd had turned wolf and there was much of a stir about the matter, and he insisted on preaching his false doctrine and he and his followers were about to assume the control and the possession of the church property, Uncle Jack went to the janitor and procured the key and quietly turned it in the lock, then put it in his pocket. That settled that question.

This good man was not always a good man but God gave him a God-fearing wife and "what knowst thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband," and she did.

He is richer now that he made himself poor for the cause of Christ.

In happy memory,

E. L. FRAZIER.

Pittsburg and Vicinity.

A missionary rally, intense in its interest, was conducted in the First Church, Allegheny, Feb. 18. The addresses, which were delivered by Brethren Warren, of Connellsville, Hanna, of Washington, Pa., Kershner, of Beaver Falls, Wise, of Somerset, and Latimer, of Pittsburg, were chaste and to the point.

The ministers of this section are a set of workers.

Bro. C. L. Thurgood has been a brigadier-general in the anti-cigarette crusade.

Bro. Jno. Jayne took an active part in the suppression of prize fights in the city of Pittsburg.

Bro. W. J. Lhamon is a leader in the anti-vice movement of the northern district of Allegheny.

Bro. Philip, of Braddock, has been in the midst of a battle against the saloon in his parish.

Two or three ministers have thrown stones at Mrs. Nation's hatchet. She has apparently made whet-stones out of them. Others have applauded her on the grounds that it is better to smash a whisky bottle than to have the whisky bottle smash a human heart. So far as we have discerned she has not been upheld by any saloonist or brewers' association.

Messrs. Cramblett, Jayne, Evans, Lobingier, Thurber, Smail, Philip, Nichols, Addy, MacKnight, Sherwood, Steenrod, Grier, Roll, Gardner, McGraw, Dinker, Mrs. Clay and others, have purchased lots at Bethany Beach on the Atlantic sea-board, which is to be the ocean resort for the Disciples of Christ.

Bro. T E. Cramblett left Tuesday morning for a tour through Egypt and the Holy Land. His congregation gave him a three months' vacation, paying his salary during this time. In addition to this, they gave him a purse containing over $250 for "pin money." A Presbyterian neighbor sent to the treasurer $20 and a set of silver spoons for Mrs. Cramblett, as a token of regard for the good work which is being accomplished by Bro. Cramblett and his congregation.

Reader, what have you done to show your appreciation of your faithful pastor?

Make the Change

Before Coffee Wrecks You.

"The right man came along one day when he told me that coffee drinking was the cause of my gastritis, nervousness, torpid liver, and trembling hands that interfered with my business, that of mechanical drawing, but coffee was my only habit and I loved it so that I did not see how I could give it up.

If he had not been so enthusiastic regarding the relief in his case by leaving off coffee and taking Postum Food Coffee I could not have mustered up will power enough to abandon my favorite beverage.

I left off coffee that day at lunch and had a cup of Postum. It was made good and had a rich, dark color, with a delicious flavor that I could not tell from regular coffee. It pleased the eye, smell and palate, so I had it each day at the restaurant for the noonday lunch, and discovered a decided improvement in my condition, but it was not until I left off coffee for breakfast and used Postum in its place that real relief set in. Now I am free from gastritis, headaches, and fully appreciate the value of the 'nerve ease.' No more trembling hands and no more nervous prostration. I am well, and feel that I should say to others who are being poisoned by a beverage that they do not suspect, 'coffee,' 'Make the change before the poison works destruction in you.' "

This letter is from a New York mechanical draughtsman. Name can be furnished by the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., at Battle Creek Mich.

Omaha and Council Bluffs.

The Hawkeye Itemizer got a little out of his beat—across the "Big Muddy"—to get acquainted with our people in Omaha. We have about 400 people in the First Church, where Sumner T. Martin, imported from Iowa ten months ago, is doing excellent work; 250 at the North Side Church, 26th and Grant St., W. T. Hilton, pastor, and 226 at South Omaha where Howard Cramblett has labored most heroically for four years—nearly 900 in the two cities.

There are a large number whose membership is still in their trunks, comparatively few of whom are known to the pastors. Six years ago a religious census showed 4,000 claiming some relation to the Christian Church. Those knowing brethren who have gone to Omaha in recent years could render an important service by notifying S. T. Martin, 2628 Cap. Av., W. T. Hilton, 2866 Maple St., Omaha, or Howard Cramblett, 1210 N. 26th St., So. Omaha.

The greatest difficulty with our churches is the scattered condition of their membership—the First Church covers a district nine miles long by three wide.

Bro. Martin has improved conditions materially and added 113 to the membership. His people will be very sorry if they are compelled to give him up at the end of his first year. He has accepted a call to become city evangelist at San Francisco, but the church protests so vigorously that he may reconsider and remain. The church is preparing for a meeting with Evangelist Scoville if there is anything left of him when he is through at Des Moines. Bro. Hilton has been with his church fifteen months, put it on a much better footing, added 115, 60 per cent. of them by baptism, and is full of practical plans for future work.

Bro. Cramblett decided to do missionary work in South Omaha instead of in the foreign field and deserves great credit for his faithful service. He now has the church at the point of a reasonable support and the erection of a suitable house of worship.

W. B. Crewdson, who has always been a creditable sample of the preachers turned out by Drake University, has been with the church at Council Bluffs six months, in which time 50 have been added, making the present number 350. We have here the same problem of a little leaven in a large lump. There is plenty of room for it to work and indications that it will. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is largely interested and will be pleased to publish many good reports of their work.

RAMBLER.

In Memory of John C. Sutton.

A copy of the Denver Republican of Feb. 19 brings the notice of the entrance into life eternal of Bro. John C. Sutton, which occurred at Denver on Monday morning, Feb. 18, and as one who was associated with Bro. Sutton in the work of Christ in Denver I write this word of praise in honor of his memory. As is well known Brother Sutton gave his fortune to the building of the South Broadway Church. He loved it as he loved his life—and more. How he used to delight to show strangers over that incomparable building! During my three years and four months' ministry with that splendid congregation I had in "Uncle" John, as we lovingly called him, a warm friend and helper. As he would help me robe for the baptismal service, which was an almost weekly occurrence—he would laughingly say, "Bro. Priest, I wonder who will help you when I am gone?" Dear, good Uncle John, good-bye for a little while. In that beautiful land where you have gone to be with Jesus, and the dear wife who went on before, we will all soon greet thee.

An Extract from Her Letter.

"If you could only be here this winter morning and see for yourself you would no longer doubt me. Roses are blooming in our front yard and all nature is as far advanced in this lovely American summer-land as it will be in your cold eastern home by June.

"We made the journey from Omaha to the Golden Gate on the Union Pacific to avoid the circuitous routes—an important item in the winter. A trip to California is made delightful by the perfect service and luxurious accommodation of 'The Overland Limited,' which is perhaps the most finely equipped train in the world."

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

Miss Anna L. May is superintendent of the school at Breckenridge. For the first time in years, the school will clear the financial decks.

The new forces in the harness at Kingston are making a united effort to have the school in keeping with their most excellent new house. They took part readily in the drill, met their apportionment in full, while Daniel Brown enrolled in our volunteer army.

Kearney school makes no pretense, but keeps such talent at the head as enables them to do the best of work, for such is their minister, H. S. Saxby. Their superintendent is pushing the Normal Drill, the school has paid its part in full, and not far in the rear is Gilead and S. H. Smith and F. V. Loos.

The present church house in Sedalia is a wonderful improvement on the first, as will be very evident to the hosts attending our State Bible-school Convention, June 10-13. The side rooms are so arranged that the entire audience of nearly 1,500 people can see the minister as well as hear every word, yet, when in use for the Bible-school work, they are so arranged as to be strictly private. The Primary room is one of the very best arranged rooms for such work in the west and Bro. Dalby seems as happy in his work as a boy with his first boots. J. W. McClain still reigns over the school forces. Mrs. J. N. Dalby's class of young ladies has raised for different funds nearly $1,000 during the ten years that she has taught them. The church in Sedalia is heated by steam from the city plant, and works like a charm. It is the only plant of the kind in the west.

In answer to the call for an increase of 100,000 in the schools of the United States, Prices Branch school sends word that they have exactly doubled their membership since December.

Miss Mattie Bound, Messrs James McAllister, Louis Cupp and J. P. McHenry join the dollar volunteers. What do you think of it, friend? H. F. DAVIS.

Idahoans, Attention!

We have at last succeeded in arranging for an evangelist who will give all of his time to the work in this state. S. G. Clay, so long and favorably known in Missouri, has been employed. He will be in our state and at work before this letter is published. He was the unanimous choice of our Board of Missions, and we confidently believe that he will do us a good work. He is a consecrated man, unblemished in character and reputation, and well qualified to present our glorious plea in any part of the state. He is not a crank, but a warm-hearted preacher of the gospel, who will preach it in love.

Now, we desire to have the hearty co-operation of all the brethren in the state of Idaho. You can materially assist us in giving us all the information that you possess with respect to localities where we have brethren living. You can call our attention to places where you think we could plant a church with a meeting and good earnest work. You can aid us in helping to support this work with your means and your prayers. We shall need both, but especially your prayers.

This is but the beginning of the work, the end is seen only by the Lord. He alone can tell the good that shall result from this work. We are sowing in faith, and we believe that we shall see a glorious harvest. Some of you who are so far away from your brethren have almost lost faith in ever seeing a Christian church established near you. May I not urge you to take courage and to hope to the end that all you have desired to see accomplished in Idaho may be brought to pass? It is my deliberate conviction that success this year, the first of our co-operative efforts, will do more to establish faith and hope in our brethren in this state than anything else. Four churches in southern Idaho have joined hands and have made great sacrifices to start this work. We believe that it is worthy to succeed, and we are sure that it will succeed.

Let me hear from you speedily as to the work needed, and also as to the amount that you are willing to give to help to sustain this work. Address the undersigned at Boise, Idaho. B. F. CLAY.

Cor. Sec. Idaho Christian Missionary Society.

Evangelistic.

Special dispatch to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

DAYTON, O., Feb. 26.—Closed Feb. 24 with 493; 32 last day; 675 in last two meetings; 1,408 since Jan. 1, 1900. I. J. Cahill is a great pastor. Steubenville, O., next.—ALLEN WILSON AND F. C. HUSTON.

Los Angeles, Cal., Feb. 17.—The annual report of the Frst Christian Church of Los Angeles, Cal., for the year 1900 shows 89 additions during the year without any special services, 25 by baptism. Lost by letter and death 40, net gain 49. Total receipts and expenditures $5,750. Of this sum over $1,400 was for missions. This report shows an increase in all lines over last year of about 25 per cent., while in missions it more than doubled all previous records. This is by far the best record in my pastorate here, which is now in its eleventh year, or in the history of this congregation.—A. C. SMITHER, pastor.

Vinita, Ind. Ter., Feb. 23.—The work at this place is progressing nicely; the attendance increasing as well as the interest. We had three accessions last Lord's day. We now have an active Endeavor Society with 11 active members and more to follow. Our Sunday-school is well attended. Our young brother, F. M. Young, is proving an efficient leader as superintendent. We have a nice lot of young people in the church work, who work with a will.—THEO. JOHNSON.

Purcell, I. T., Feb. 15.—Seven weeks' meeting closed Feb. 14. Fifty-four additions; 40 baptisms; two from Baptists, five from Southern Methodist, one M. E. J. T. Haddock, of Bells, Tenn., did the preaching. Purcell is considered one of the hardest points in the south to do church work, but the old gospel triumphed over all. Bro. Haddock goes to Weatherford to begin Feb. 24. Our work moves along nicely. Sixty-two additions since September 1, when I began the work here.—W. A. WHERRY, pastor.

Council Bluffs, Ia., Feb. 18.—On next Lord's day we expect to begin a revival meeting with home forces (except singer) and expect Bro. J. Will Landrum to lead the hosts in song.—W. B. CREWDSON.

Council Bluffs, Ia., Feb. 25.—Our meeting began yesterday with fine interest and four additions. We hope for a good meeting. Bro. Landrum is our song leader.—W. B. CREWDSON.

Des Moines, Ia., Feb. 19.—Three accessions Sunday. Will hold a meeting next month.—E. W. BRICKERT, pastor East Side Church of Christ.

Estherville, Ia., Feb. 14.—Bro. A. A. Holmes, the young Baptist minister here, has united with us to work for the union of God's people. Bro. Holmes was a very strong Baptist less than a year ago, and it was not without a hard effort that he was reached. He is a good, clear thinker and an earnest speaker. He will surely make a strong man for the cause of New Testament Christianity. This is the second Baptist minister that we have captured out of Estherville since I have been here (14 months). These victories and the 92 additions we have had are rapidly bringing us into favorable notice of the people. Bro. D. D. Boyle is to begin a meeting next Lord's day.—H. MORTON GREGORY.

Pleasantville, Ia., Feb. 21.—We are in a great meeting, with H. C. Patterson, of Irvington, Ind., as evangelist. The large auditorium of our new church is crowded each night to hear this eloquent advocate of the word. Meeting but fairly begun with 12 added and many more to follow. Our men's meeting Sunday P. M. was a grand success. Never before did our town witness so many men gathered together in a religious meeting. Meeting for ladies only, Feb. 24, 3 P. M. Bro. Patterson combines ability both to instruct and to move men for Christ.—FORREST D. FERRALL, pastor.

Storm Lake, Ia., Feb. 18.—One confession at morning service yesterday.—LEGRAND PACE.

Sioux City, Ia., Feb. 19.—Nine added here yesterday; 24 in all to date. C. M. Wickham, the pastor, has been here just nine months and has added 103 to the membership in this time. We continue.—E. W. KERR, singing evangelist.

Tama, Ia., Feb. 18.—Report of the church for the 10 months of my pastorate ending Feb. 17: Sermons 110; pastoral calls 613; additions by baptism, six; total additions 12; loss two; net gain 10; total membership 108, of which 25 are non-resident; average attendance of Bible-school 41; average attendance of prayer-meeting 16; raised for missions $36.43; for local expense $804.41. The church never gave to missions before. We believe that in the future they will respond to all calls as they are able.—F. L. DAVIS.

Waterloo, Ia., Feb. 18.—Three more additions, making six since our arrival, in January.—JOE S. RILEY.

Clay City, Ill., Feb. 19.—We closed a two weeks' meeting here last night which resulted in six additions. Prof. C. M. Hughes, of Kentucky, had charge of the music and we are more than pleased with his work. He will next assist Bro. J. A. Battenfield in a meeting at Fairfield.—WALTER KLINE.

Clay City, Ill., Feb. 20.—We closed a very interesting meeting here Monday night. The attendance throughout was good and interest fine. I gave song lecture last night to a good house. I begin to-night at Fairfield, this state.—C. M HUGHES, singing evangelist.

Concord, Ill., Feb. 18.—The meeting at this place closed last night with 15 additions. The pastor, J. W. Camp, did the preaching. Mr. Jones, of Lynnville, led the singing the last week. There was great interest and large audiences at all the services.—L. E. H.

Decatur, Ill., Feb. 18.—We have had eight more additions at the tabernacle since last report.—J. C. COGGINS.

Exchange, Ill., Feb. 25.—I began a meeting at Union in Wayne county, Feb. 13; closed Feb. 24. Five additions by confession and baptism. I received a call for one fourth time.—LEW D. HILL, evangelist.

Galesburg, Ill., Feb. 22.—Six additions last Sunday.—C. H. WHITE, pastor.

Roodhouse, Ill., Feb. 21—We are in a meeting here. It is 12 days old, with 19 added to the church. The meetings will perhaps not close under a month. Let my correspondents address me henceforth at 692 19th St., Des Moines, Ia.—SIMPSON ELY.

Princeton, Ill , Feb. 12.—One returned with her church letter last Lord's day; three were added by letter, two obeyed the gospel and one other made the good confession, yet to be baptized. Dr. G. W. Taylor made out a deed Saturday, Feb. 9, giving to the church an elegant parsonage. This was publicly announced Sunday. It was a great day. In the last year the church has given about $250 to missions and supported its own work.—J. G. WAGGONER, minister.

Bedford, Ind., Feb. 20.—We had seven added last Sunday here. The Baptist brethren are letting us have the use of their baptistry until our new church is finished. E. S. Stephens, our missionary from Japan, was with us two Sundays ago. His addresses were strong and his spirit delightful. We will secure, I think, the largest missionary collection on the first Sunday in March that the old Bedford church has ever taken.—JAMES SMALL.

Columbus, Ind., Feb. 21.—Our meeting in the Christian church here is just closed. Bro. S. M. Martin, of St. Louis, Mo., was our evangelist. Meeting lasted seven weeks with 103 additions. Bro. Martin never lowered the gospel standard to please men. No effort was made to court popular favor nor to compromise with the world, the flesh or the devil.—A. J. FRANK, pastor.

Elwood, Ind., Feb. 20.—We are in a revival here with Bro. T. A. Hedges, of Missouri. Just started with three additions, hope for a large soul harvest Bro. Hedges is giving good sermons. Miss Mary F. Harris, of Richmond, Ind., is leading our singing. She is a splendid soloist and helper.—L. C. HOWE, pastor.

Madison, Ind., Feb. 25.—F. M. Rains, of Cincinnati, will dedicate our new house of worship for us the third Lord's day in March. Have had eight additions since coming here the first of the year. Madison Church has had many discouragements, but the prospects are brighter now than for some time.—J. MURRAY TAYLOR.

Michigantown, Ind., Feb. 23.—Seven additions here since last report; four came from the Church of God, three made the good confession. The superintendent of the public school united with the Christian Church at Russiaville, Ind., last Sunday.—LEWIS R. HOTALING, pastor.

Oxford, Ind., Feb. 21.—Our pastor, T. A. Hall, assisted by E. B. Kelley, of Brook, Ind., held a three weeks' meeting in January with 15 additions, 13 baptisms and the church strengthened spiritually.—PHEBE KOLB.

Terre Haute, Ind., Feb. 25.—Closed a meeting of 10 days at Fontanet last night; organized a church of 17 members and a good Sunday-school. They will build a house soon. If you can help them write J. W. Turner, Fontanet, Ind. This is a thriving town of about 800, two churches and eight saloons. This would be a good investment for some brother or sister.—L. V. BARBRE, district evangelist.

Iola, Kan., Feb. 25.—Just closed a little meeting with home forces, with 69 added, 52 of them by primary obedience. This makes 190 added since last May. Hundreds turned away for want of room. Meeting house entirely too small for Bible school and church meetings. Hence a building boom is on at fever heat. We are united, happy and grateful to our Heavenly Father.—G. M. WEIMER.

Bluff City, Kan., Feb. 21.—I visit the little congregation near Castleton once a month. In November, 1899, I began preaching once a month for the church at Sand Creek, O. T., then numbering 13 members. At the end of the year they were able to employ me for half time for this year. Last Lord's day I presented our plea to them again on Home and Foreign Mission work and we will send a small contribution for foreign work. We want this church on the list of aggressive churches before the end of this year. If any desire to correspond with them, write to C. B. Asher, Sand Creek, O. T.—E. B. HUFF.

Caney, Kan., Feb. 23.—I resigned here Feb. 17, to take effect April 1, 1901. The church at Caney has some good men in it and good women not a few, though like the church at "Pergamos", Rev. 2:13, unfavorably situated. It has not been our pleasure to live among a people more social, genial and hospitable than those of Caney and vicinity. The church is very prompt in the discharge of her financial obligations. Another pastor will soon be employed doubtless and the work move right on. We leave with many regrets but feel that we can do more good in the Master's cause elsewhere. We go to Nortonville, Jefferson Co., Kan.—J. B. LOCKHART.

Goodland, Kan., Feb. 22.—Our meeting is getting along real well. Three additions to date. Joints all closed; town is dry.—V. E. RIDENOUR, singer.

Larned, Kan., Feb. 7.—We are holding a meeting for Pastor C. T. Hall. Meeting three weeks old. Thirty-four additions, mostly by primary obedience, over half of them young men. Will close soon.—E. W. CARR, pastor Dodge City, Kas.

Mt. Hope, Kan., Feb. 20.—I visited Garden Plain for the first time last Lord's day and report six additions as a result. People enthusiastic.—A. L. MARTIN.

Carthage, Mo., Feb. 20.—Two confessions at Golden City Sunday.—M. S. JOHNSON.

California, Mo., Feb. 22—Judge Embry, one of California's prominent citizens, 70 years of age, made the "good confession" last Sunday night and was baptized to-day. Our work is prosperous.—C. C. HILL.

Grove Spring, Mo.—I am in a good meeting here. Eight additions up to date; meeting one week old.—JOHN GIDDENS.

Kansas City, Mo., Feb. 25.—I am preaching a few days for Bro. T. P. Haley and his little mission church. We had a fine day yesterday. A deep spiritual feeling and 10 were added by confession and letter. Bro. Haley baptized two who confessed before our special services. Will continue over Sunday.—R. L. MCHATTON, 1827 Penn St.

Kansas City, Mo., Feb. 22.—I have recently assisted E. J. Fenstermacher at Lexington, Mo., at the reopening of their church auditorium, after repairs to about $3,000 had been made. They now have one of the prettiest and best auditoriums in the state. I continued with him 12 days with 11 accessions to the church. Was then summoned home because of sickness in my family. Bro. Fenstermacher is continuing the meeting and at last report four more were added.—A. W. KOKENDOFFER.

Moberly, Mo., Feb. 20.—Seven accessions last Sunday to the Central Church. Eighteen thus far in the new year; sixty in ten months at regular services. S. M. Martin is to be with us in April. No debt and church in good condition for a great meeting.—SAMUEL B. MOORE.

Niangua, Mo., Feb. 21.—I am in a good meeting here. Good crowds and fine prospects. The work is prospering in south-west Missouri, but we need more reapers.—JOS. GAYLOR.

Newport, Mo., Feb. 21.—Am in a meeting with the Round Prairie brethren. Meeting four days old, three additions. I have a valuable assistant in the person of Bro. J. W. Wise, of Newport.—H. W. MCVAY.

Plevna, Mo.—Closed short meeting here with 11 added; two weeks at Mt. Pleasant, 16 added; 20 men, seven women; next meeting, Elwood, Ind.—J. A. HEDGES.

St. Louis, Mo., Feb. 25.—One addition at Fourth Church.—E. T. MCFARLAND.

Windsor, Mo.—Am in a meeting at Franks where we have no church. Have had six additions, and think we can organize a church and Bible school.—R. B. HAVENER, state Bible-school evangelist.

Ansley, Neb., Feb. 19.—Four additions at the regular services last Lord's day. All departments of work moving along encouragingly.—JESSE R. TEAGARDEN, pastor.

Falls City, Neb., Feb. 23.—Our meetings are starting nicely. There have been 20 additions to this church, 12 confessions. The outlook is hopeful. We are expecting a good meeting. —J. M. VAWTER.

Firth, Neb., Feb. 28.—We closed the meeting at Waco last Monday evening with 26 additions, 17 by baptism, six by letter, with one from the Catholics and six from the Protestant Methodists. A net gain of 20. We began here at Firth last Wednesday evening. —R. A. GIVENS.

New York, N. Y., Feb. 21.—We have just closed a three weeks' meeting in the Lenox Avenue Church with 36 additions, mostly by baptism. Bro. Melvin Putman, of Sedalia, Mo., did the preaching. This is one of the best meetings that I remember in my sixteen years' residence in this city. Many of the additions were from new families, so that our church has gotten a stronger hold upon the community. Bro. Putman's preaching is plain and simple, and his big heart and cordial manner carry everything before him. The church has been awakened, and the entire community to some extent, and we confidently expect further fruitage. We now have a membership of something over 300. The foundations have now been laid deep and strong for a great work, and we are hoping and praying for more rapid growth in the next few years. A family in my church have just presented us with a fine individual communion set, which will be introduced in a week or two.—J. M. PHILPUTT.

Findlay, O., Feb. 25.—One confession Feb. 17; four added yesterday. Our Endeavorers have adopted a boy in India and have forwarded the means for his support to headquarters. Our interest maintains; growth is constant.—A. M. GROWDEN.

Findlay, O., Feb. 18.—One confession yesterday, a young man who drove 10 miles to obey the gospel. Our Endeavorers will support a boy in India.—A. M. GROWDEN.

Nelsonville, O., Feb. 18.—Three baptisms since last report.—C. M. KEENE.

Newark, O., Feb. 22.—Closed a five weeks' meeting Feb. 17; baptisms, 69, others, 34; total, 103. G. L. Cook, of Geneva, O., sang for us during the first three weeks, and Mr. and Mrs. E. N. Gibbs, of Kipton, O., the last two weeks. Sixteen others, not previously reported, have been added since Oct. 1; eight of them under C. A. Freer's preaching.—MINER LEE BATES.

La Grande, Ore., Feb. 20.—Dedicated our church Sunday, Feb. 17. Bro. J. B. Lister, our state evangelist, was present. After many changes and struggles our little band has a home. The lots cost $800, the building a little over $1,600. The Board of Church Extension came to our aid at a time when it meant very much. Sunday we asked for subscriptions. No noise, no announcing names of givers. It was giving to Him and not to be seen of men. We called for $500; received $544.80. In the evening asked to make it $700 and again we went beyond our call, and the total for the day was $810.40.—O. H. KING.

Lamont, O. T., Feb. 19.—We closed a six weeks' meeting with the people of Lamont, O. T., with 16 additions, 11 former members and five confessions. The brethren are making an effort to build a church house and have the foundation already laid and about $600 subscription. We go from here to a point six miles north of Perry.—C. A. SHIVE AND WIFE, territorial evangelists.

Shawnee, Okla., Feb. 17.—I closed a meeting at Perry, O. T., on Feb. 7, with 50 additions. Am in a meeting at Shawnee, O. T. The meeting here is one week old with 18 additions. Have had 145 additions in the last 121 days. Perry is a city of 6,000 inhabitants, and Shawnee is a town of 8,000. To those who are writing and asking for meetings will say that I am engaged for every day, seven months ahead, and can not promise any more work before September or October, 1901.—JOHN A. STEVENS.

Ponca City, Okla., Feb. 20.—Thirty six additions; 12 to night.—THOMAS H. POPPLEWELL.

Ponca City, Okla., Feb. 20.—Thirty-six additions; 12 to-night.—THOMAS H. POPPLEWELL.

We go from here to Johnstown. June, July and August yet untaken. Churches desiring meetings write us at once.—FRED A. NICHOLS, evangelist for western Pennsylvania.

E. and 10 by letter and statement, 36 in all. Everett is a rapidly growing city of about 10,000 population, the church there numbers 112 now, some of the best people of Everett are members.—L. F. STEPHENS and wife, evangelists.

Waterville, Wash., Feb. 20.—This church was supposed to be dead, the members not having had a meeting of any kind for nearly a year. A debt of $2,500. I came here last December, forty responded to our appeal to go to work again and to this number we have added 14, 7 by letter and 7 by baptism, organized a Sunday-school with 15 and now have 70 enrolled, started a prayer-meeting and organized a Y. P. S. C. E. and combined them. This combination started with 10, now numbers 50. Organized a Ladies' Aid Society with 8 members and this has increased to 15 and they work as if life depended upon it.—R. E. MCKNIGHT.

FREE KIDNEY CURE.

A Trial Case of a Remarkable Remedy Mailed Free to Every Sufferer Sending Name and Address.

DEAR SIRS:—I am a passenger engineer on the H. & T. C. R. R. and have been for twenty years. I have suffered with Kidney and Liver trouble for fifteen years. Before I commenced to take your remedy I had to lay off, and was not able to turn in bed or get up in the morning, but since taking Alkavis have not suffered with my Kidneys or Rheumatism, nor have I lost a day. Before taking your medicine I made application to join insurance orders, but was rejected on account of Kidney trouble, but six months after taking I was examined again and passed O. K. CHAS. B. BRADY.

Disorders of the Kidneys and Bladder cause Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Gravel, Pain in the Back, Bladder Disorders, difficult or too frequent passing water, Dropsy, etc. For these diseases a Positive Specific Cure is found in a new botanical discovery, the wonderful Kava-Kava Shrub, called by botanists the piper methysticum, from the Ganges River, East India. It has the extraordinary record of 1,200 hospital cures in 30 days. It acts directly on the Kidneys, and cures by draining out of the Blood the poisonous Uric Acid, Urates, Lithates, etc., which cause the disease. Hon. R. C. Wood, of Lowell, Ind., writes that in four weeks he was cured of Rheumatism, Kidney and Bladder disease after ten years' suffering. His bladder trouble was so great he had to get up five to twelve times during the night. Hundreds of others, and many ladies, including Mrs. Sarah Castle, of Poestenkill, N. Y., and Mrs. L. D. Fegeley, Lancaster, Ills., also testify to its wonderful curative powers in Kidney and other disorders peculiar to womanhood.

That you may judge of the value of this Great Discovery for yourself, we will send you one Large Case by mail free, only asking that when cured yourself you will recommend it to others as it deserves. It is a sure Specific cure and can not fail. Address, The Church Kidney Cure Company, No. 401 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

Family Circle.

Fret Not Thyself.

The little sharp vexations,
And the briers that catch and fret
Why not take all to the Helper
Who has never failed us yet?
Tell Him about the heartache,
And tell Him the longings, too;
Tell Him the baffled purpose
When we scarce know what to do;
Then, leaving all our weakness
With the One divinely strong,
Forget that we bore the burden,
And carry away the song.

"God Save the Queen."

It may already have occurred to many that the accession of a new monarch to the English throne will necessitate a new version of the national anthem. Even the version in use before Queen Victoria's time will not answer. The Boston Post gives the following history of that much appropriated tune:

Of all the national songs ever written there is none which has been put to more diverse uses by the nations of the earth than "God Save the Queen."

This English national anthem has become a patriotic song in Germany even. It has been used there since 1793, under the title of "Heil der im Siegerkranz." It was also adopted in Switzerland and has received many American and other settings.

The beginning of "God Save the Queen" is wrapped in mystery. In that particular this song is not unlike many other national works.

The first claim for the music is that it was written by Doctor John Bull in 1619, and, in fact, there is such a piece of music which resembles the present national anthem, but Doctor Bull's music was written in a minor key. There is also a Scottish work entitled "Remember, O Thou Man," which bears a resemblance, but this was also written in a minor key. Another ballad, entitled "Franklin is Fled Away," written in 1669, is in the same form, but there is a difference in the melody.

In 1696 Henry Purcell wrote a harpsichord piece which bears a resemblance to the last half of the melody. Even a King figures in the claims, for it is said that James II wrote the words and music and had them sung in his chapel. It is also alleged that the song was written for James III. Lully, the French composer, laid claim to writing the tune.

And yet with all these claims there seems to be little question that Henry Carey, the composer of "Sally in Our Alley," was the author and composer of this great English anthem. Carey lived to be 80 years of age and then committed suicide. When he died he had but a single half-penny in his pocket. Carey was a genius and lived a blameless life. But here is the history of the song: It was in a tavern in Cornhill in Boston in 1740, at a meeting convened to celebrate the capture of Porto Bello, that Carey announced that the song was his own composition, both words and music. He had sung it to the gathered throng and was heartily applauded. There were many witnesses to the announcement. Many musical authorities assert that the idea that Carey could have stolen such a striking work is ridiculous.

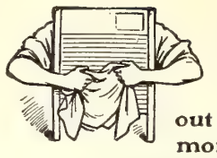
It was "God Save Great George, Our King," when the composition was written. The resemblance to older compositions is not particularly strange, for, as Elson explains it, "any great national song intended to be performed by great masses of singers, often untrained, must be of simple construction."

The entire compass of this work is less than an octave, a great merit. "Such a tune will always bear a family resemblance to many others," said Elson, in his recent work on national music. "The chief theme of the finale of Beethoven's ninth symphony, for example, is as close to 'Yankee Doodle' as any of the before cited tunes are to 'God Save the King,' yet no one has accused the great symphonist of stealing the American melody. It is finical folly to dwell upon such resemblances as having any historical importance."

No sooner had "God Save Great George, Our King" appeared and been sung here in Boston than the whole English nation took it up. It was given a respect equal to that accorded the English flag.

Haydn, the great composer, was even impressed by the popularity of the music in England. His two visits to London in 1791 and 1794-95 impressed the popularity of the music on his mind. When he returned to Austria he determined to write a national anthem for his own country. He labored on this some time, and in January, 1797, he produced "Gott erhalt Franz der Kaiser," the words for this being written by a poet named Hauschka. This was but a version of the English national anthem. It has been said that this attempt at the composition of a national hymn is the only one on record when such composition was premeditated.

This great English hymn was appropriated by every one. In different countries it became popular and different composers took it up. Weber and Beethoven used it. It also became a Danish national air. Prussia afterwards took it, and America accepted it and applied the words of "My Country, 'Tis of Thee." There were other versions used in America and other verses written, but all were forgotten for the present.



To Whip the Editor.

"What are you crying about?" asked a kind-hearted stranger of a lad standing in front of a newspaper office, weeping as if his heart would break.

"Oh, pa's gone upstairs to whip the editor."

"Well, has he come down yet?" pursued the gentle Samaritan.

"Pieces of him have," said the boy, with a fresh burst of tears, "and I'm expecting the rest every minute."

A Syndicate of Sorrow.

The most selfish man in the world is the one who is the most unselfish—with his sorrows. He does not leave a single misery of his untold to you, or unsuffered by you—he gives you all of them. The world becomes to him a syndicate formed to take stock in his private cares, worries and trials. His mistake is in forming a syndicate; he should organize a trust and control it all himself, then he could keep every one from getting any of his misery.

Autobiography constitutes a large part of the conversation of some people. It is not really conversation, it is an uninterrupted monologue. These people study their individual lives with a microscope, and then they throw an enlarged view of their miseries on a screen and lecture on them, as a stereopticon man discourses on the microbes in a drop of water. They tell you that "they did not sleep a wink all night; they heard the clock strike every quarter of an hour." Now, there is no real cause for thus boasting of insomnia. It requires no peculiar talent, even though it does come only to wide-awake people.

If you ask such a man how he is feeling, he will trace the whole genealogy of his present condition down from the time he had the grip four years ago. You hope for a word; he gives you a treatise. You asked for a sentence; he delivers an encyclopedia. His motto is: "Every man his own Boswell." He is syndicating his sorrows.

The woman who makes her trials with her children, her troubles with her servants, her difficulties with her family, the subjects of conversation with her callers, is syndicating her sorrows. If she has a dear little innocent child who recites "Curfew Shall Not Ring To-night," is it not wiser for the mother to bear it calmly and discreetly and in silence, than to syndicate this sorrow?—William George Jordan.

hair is red and tangled, and he has a turned-up nose;
His voice is loud and strident, and it never gets repose;
His face is full of freckles, and his ears are shaped like fins,
And a large front tooth is missing, as you'll notice when he grins.
He is like a comic picture, from his toes up to his head—
But his mother calls him "darling" when she tucks him into bed.

It is he who marks the carpet with the print of muddy boots;
And rejoices in a door-bell that is pulled out by the roots.
Who whistles on his fingers till he almost splits your ear,
And shocks the various callers with the slang he chanced to hear.
He fills the house with tumult and the neighborhood with dread—
But his mother calls him "darling" when she tucks him into bed.

Song of the Dollar.

The following apostrophe to the cart-wheel, the silver wheel upon which the car of human progress rolls forward, will touch many a heart that can not be touched by any less potent appeal. The Troy Times is responsible for it.

How dear to our heart is the old silver dollar, when some kind admirer presents it to view; the liberty head without necktie or collar, and all the strange things which to us seem so new; the wide-spreading eagle, the arrows below it, the stars and the words with the strange things they tell; the coin of our fathers, we're glad that we know it, for some time or other 'twill come in right well; the spread-eagle dollar, the star-spangled dollar, the old silver dollar we all love so well.

Slate Pencils.

The information contained in the following paragraph from the trade journal "Cement and Slate" may have some interest, not because you are particularly anxious to find out how slate pencils are made but because it never occurred to you before to think that so simple a thing as a slate pencil has to be made at all, and that by a somewhat complex process.

Slate pencils were formerly all cut from solid slate, just as it is dug from the earth, but pencils so made were objected to on account of the grit which they contain, which would scratch the slate. To overcome this difficulty, an ingenious process has been devised by which the slate is ground to a very fine powder, all grit and foreign substances removed and the powder bolted through silk cloth in much the same manner in which flour is bolted. The powder is then made into a dough, and this dough is subjected to a very heavy hydraulic pressure, which presses the pencil out the required shape and diameter, but in length of about three feet. While yet soft the pencils are cut into the desired lengths and set out to dry in the open air. After they are thoroughly dry the pencils are placed in steam baking kilns, where they receive the proper temper. Pencils made in this manner are not only free from all grit and of uniform hardness, but are stronger than those cut out of solid slate. For these reasons they have superseded the old kind. Over 25,000,000 of these pencils were made and sold in 1899 by one American concern in Chattanooga.

A Compromise.

One time on the Texas frontier, a man came into camp riding an old mule.

"How much for that mule?" asked a bystander.

"Jest a hundred dollars," answered the driver.

"I'll give you five dollars," said the other.

The driver stopped short, as if in amazement, and then slowly dismounted.

"Stranger," he said, "I ain't a-goin' to let a little matter of ninety-five dollars stand between me and a mule trade. The mule is yourn."

Regarding Luck.

He Missed Her.

An elderly villager of a New Hampshire town had just contracted a second matrimonial alliance after a brief interval of widowerhood. The ceremony was over and the invited guests gathered round, anxious to greet the bride. "Neighbors," said the groom to the assembled company, "you all know that this good friend that's consented to marry me is something of a stranger in our town. Now I feel kind of insufficient, being only a man, to make her acquainted with everybody as quick as I'd like to. So I'm a-going to depend on you women folks," he added, with a confiding smile at the members of the gentler sex, "to make her feel at home among us, just as my first wife would do if she were here to-day. I miss her consid'rable all the time, but more'n usual on an occasion like this!"

The Aunt and the General.

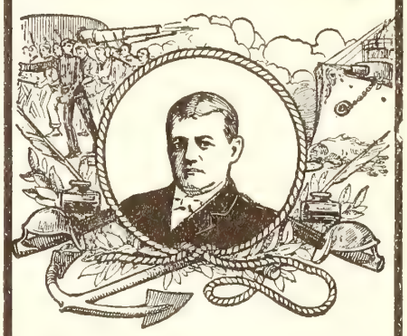
It happened, says a Western paper, that the death of an elderly lady in Prague was the occasion of a remarkable telegraphic correspondence between the capitals of Saxony, Bohemia and Russia. A gentleman living in Dresden had a maiden aunt who was taken sick and died in a hospital at Prague on her way to Vienna.

The nephew was notified, and he telegraphed to the Prague hospital authorities to send the body to Dresden, for entombment in the family vault.

When the coffin arrived and was opened, it was found to contain, not the body of the aunt, but that of a uniformed and bedizened Russian general. Immediately the nephew telegraphed to Prague:

"No dead aunt, but Russian general. Where dead aunt?"

From Prague came the reply: "If dead aunt not arrived, then Petersburg."



The next telegram went to the railway authorities at St. Petersburg, and read:

"What do with Russian general? Where is dead aunt?"

And from St. Petersburg was received the reply:

"Bury general in all silence. Aunt just buried here with highest military honors."

Mother—Bobby, this is the third time I've caught you stealing jam, and I'm getting tired of it.

Bobby—Well, why don't you quit hangin' 'round the pantry, then?

Sunday-school Teacher: "What do we learn from the story of Samson?"

Tommy (mournfully smoothing his ragged locks): "That it doesn't pay ter have women folks cut a feller's hair."

"Oh, my dear daughter!" (to a little girl of six) "You should not be frightened and run from the goat. Don't you know you are a Christian Scientist?"

"But, mamma" (excitedly), "the billy-goat doesn't know!"

"Your husband is not looking well to-night, Mrs. Rhymer." "He isn't, and I'm not surprised at it." "No? Has he been overworking himself?" "It isn't that so much; it is his originality. Why, that man is struck by so many original ideas that his mind must be one mass of bruises."

"How tired your foot must be!" said an onlooker to a potter who was turning his wheel with one foot while the other rested on the ground.

"No," was the answer, "it isn't the foot that works that gets tired. It's the foot that stands still."

How Toggles Thought It Out.

Toggles' Sunday-school teacher had told him something he did not understand very well. As nearly as he could remember, she had said that some man had said that the whole world was like two great heaps, one of the happy things and the other of the unhappy things, and every time we took something from the unhappy heap, and put it on the happy heap, we made the whole world pleasanter and better. Then she had told them a story about how the man who said that had made the world happier by giving a penny to a little girl who had lost hers and was crying about it. Toggles thought it very unlikely that he would ever do a thing like that, because, even if he should meet such a little girl, the chances are he wouldn't have any penny, and so he didn't know just what the teacher meant. If he had been at home with his own Sunday-school teacher, he might have asked; but being at grandpa's on a visit, and having a new teacher, he just kept very quiet and put the whole matter carefully away into the back of his head, to keep until he had time to think it over.

The time came the next afternoon, when he was out by the barn, digging in the load of new, fresh sand that grandpa had had dumped there on purpose for him. He made two great piles, as nearly of a size as he could, and the one by his left foot he called the happy pile, and the one by his right hand the unhappy pile; and then he would take a big trowel full of sand from the right-hand pile, and let it sift down on to the left-foot pile, and rejoice to see the unhappy heap grow smaller, and the happy heap grow bigger. And all the time he was thinking how to tell it to Mabel, who was Toggles' little sister, and who hadn't been to Sunday-school because she had torn a great hole in one of her new shoes, and the shoemaker hadn't fixed it yet.

It was while he was very busy there that mamma called him to come into the house. Grandpa had come back with the wagon, and was all ready to take him to the big factory where they made the kind of milk Toggles had seen the men squirt out of the cows into the thick, sticky milk that Toggles's mamma bought in cans at the grocery store. It was something Toggles was very much interested in, and he had asked so many questions about it that grandpa had promised to take him to see it done.

They were just ready to start, and grandpa had just said "Get up!" to Dobbin, when Mabel, in her stocking feet, came running to the door.

"I want to go too," she called.

"Oh, no!" said mamma, "you have not any shoes to put on. Why, what would the men in the big factory say if they were to see a little girl without any shoes?"

"I want to go." repeated Mabel. "I want to see them make the thick, sticky milk."

"No," said mamma, "you can go some other time."

"And then Mabel began to cry, for she was littler than Toggles, and all of a sudden Toggles thought of his two heaps.

"I can go some other time," he said. "Mabel can wear my shoes."

And, sitting down on the steps, he began to unbutton them as fast as ever he could.

Grandpa and mamma did not say anything, while Mabel, with tear-stained cheeks, but as radiant as a little cherub, was pulling on the shoes Toggles had just taken off, but they looked at each other, and there were tears in mamma's eyes.

"Good-by," called Mabel, as grandpa gathered up the reins. "I wish you were going too."

"Oh! never mind," answered Toggles, "I can go some other time."

And then, hurrying back to his piles, he fell to digging so hard that, long before grandpa and Mabel returned, the unhappy heap was gone, and only the great, round happy heap remained.—Frederic Hall in Sunday School Times.

From Pop-Corn to Politics

Prominent in national affairs just now is the figure of a man who began his business career some thirty odd years ago, selling pop-corn in the depot of a certain thriving railroad town. His mother was a widow, and, as the oldest of three children, it fell to his lot to help fill the family purse. This is the way he did it:

When the through train pulled into the station to wait "twenty minutes for refreshments," and change engines, John was on hand with a big basket of crisp, freshly-popped corn, fragrant, delicious, nicely buttered and salted. Mother and sister attended to the popping and seasoning of the stock in trade, and John was salesman, general manager and hustler-in-chief. It was his business to sell the corn after it popped, and he did it. He was wide-awake, obliging, honest. The corn was of the best quality, neither burned nor leathery, and the butter was beyond reproach. A good many travelers discovered that it was pleasanter to lunch on fresh pop-corn than on stale sandwiches. When the trains pulled out, John made the rounds of stores and offices, and little by little worked up a trade that brought in quite a respectable income.

When the younger brother was old enough, the pop-corn route was made over to him, and John found employment in the office of a lawyer who had been one of his customers. He was janitor, errand-boy, copying clerk, and all-around "handy man," with little time for anything but work; but he soon saw that the trained mind is the one that wins life's race. So he made arrangements to attend night-school, and spent his spare time digging into mathematics, history and various other branches of practical education. Later, he asked and received the privilege of reading his employer's law-books, and, to make a long story short, he succeeded in passing a creditable examination, was admitted to the bar, and by and by became junior partner in the firm he had served as janitor. Law led him into politics, and today the Hon. John S——— represents in congress the very district in whose principal town he once sold pop-corn, did errands and swept offices.

So much for the pluck and perseverance of a typical American boy. He has won success for himself, and his example remains for an inspiration to others who, like him, are bound for the hilltop.—The American Boy.

The Talkative Rill.

Once upon a time there was a Rill, which prattled loquaciously as it fell over the stones.

A Poet came and heard it and wrote sundry rhapsodies; the next day it rained and in one way and another the Rill became much swelled as to its head, and prattled the more.

Presently a Man of Affairs chanced that way and when he heard the Rill prattling he straightway built a dam, which gathered the Rill into a great, silent millpond.

Now the Rill says nothing and saws wood.

"I might better have dried up!" it thinks, sadly.

This fable teaches the practicability of illustrating the unwisdom of extreme garrulity without recourse to the story of the profane parrot.—Detroit Journal.

Things to Forget.

If you would increase your happiness and prolong your life, forget your neighbor's faults. Forget the slander you have heard. Forget the temptations. Forget the fault-finding and give a little thought to the cause which provoked it. Forget the peculiarities of your friends, and only remember the good points which make you fond of them. Forget all personal quarrels or histories you may have heard by accident, and which, if repeated, would seem a thousand times worse than they are.

Blot out as far as possible all the disagreeables of life; they will come, but they will grow larger when you remember them, and the constant thought of the acts of meanness, or, worse still, malice, will only tend to make you more familiar with them. Obliterate everything disagreeable from yesterday; start out with a clean sheet for to-day, and write upon it for sweet memory's sake only those things which are lovely and lovable.—The Trumpeter.

At the Rummage Sale.

If one has anything around the house one wants to get rid of, the proper thing to do is to send it to a rummage sale. There is a perfect craze just now for this form of entertainment or charity, whichever it may be, for all rummage sales are not alike. This true story proceeds from a recent sale held for a church fund.

An enthusiastic young woman attended the sale and returned from it in great glee.

"Wait until you see what I've found," she announced to her mother; "just what we have been looking for in every attic and antique shop for years. I knew we'd get it some day, and now you won't laugh at rummage sales any more."

"What is it?" asked the dear old lady.

"It's a mate to that antique candlestick you've had so long and never could match." She proudly unwrapped the bundle. "There! isn't that perfect?"

"It is indeed," replied her mother, a queer little smile playing about her face. "In fact, it is the same. I got tired of having it around the house, and sent it to the rummage sale to get rid of it."—New York Mail and Express.

Advance Society Letters.

I know I can't print all your letters this week, but I always save over for another time. I have many guesses on "Pete," but will print none of them till the guessing-time is over; then we will have a solid page of guesses, and each will know how the others guessed. Remember, the correct solution wins "Shem" for a prize; so guess away and luck to you!

McXie Mason, Palestine, Tex.; "I have been a silent admirer of your page for some time. My only objection is that you don't get enough of that fine story 'Pete' at a time. I wish to become a member of the Advance Society. My favorite books are Black Beauty, Aunt Maria's Saturday Talks and Count up the Sunny days." Maye Heizer, Chilo, O.; "Just after I joined the Av. S., I went to Chicago on a visit for five weeks, and you know a person can't visit and read very well, so I have not kept the rules. When I came home school had commenced, and I was so very busy studying. But I intend to turn over a new leaf and try my best." Pearl Bagley, Mabelvale, Ark.; "I send my guess on 'Pete.' We still take the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Hurrah for the Av. S. I will still be a member." Maude Kelley, Beardsley, Minn.; "I am coming, but not as I should. I kept the rules for five months, but when my baby sister died, I forgot to read my poetry. I had a good time Christmas and New Year's, and hope all the members did, too. How many members have we now? I wish some of the girls would write to me." (1500 members.) Mattie Upton, Houstonia, Mo.; "My Sunday-school teacher gave a prize for the best attendance, recitation and attention. I got the prize. It was a wish-pin with blue sets. Mamma said, A happy New Year to you all!" Burleigh Cash, Pennville, Ind.; "I got a good book for Christmas, The Ironclad Pledge. I think 'Pete' fine, but I have not yet thought who the tramp Nap is. I am glad I joined the Av. S. I think those who have not joined ought to, for it is a great thing. It helps me to greater things. I wish some members would write to me." Lola Cox, Cox, Mo.: "I have been a member of the Av. S. for two years and I have kept the rules faithfully. I feel as if I were well acquainted with you." (I like that very much. By the way, I wonder if Julia and Lola Cox were named after Cox, Mo., or if Cox, Mo., was named after them?)

Floyd E. Morgan, Carlisle, Ia.; "I would like to join the Av. S. I've read the Children's Page since it began. I think Red Box Clew was fine; so is 'Pete.' I am 14. I think Nap is—" (But I mustn't print that part!) "Hoping to win the prize, I will close." Effie Smith, Carthage Mo.; I thought I would write and join the Av. S Miss Foland is my Sunday-school teacher and a nicer one I never had. Our preacher is Mr. Oldham. We have just had a protracted meeting. Mr. Hill was the minister and Mr. Guy B. Williamson was the singing evangelist. He's the man I imagine you to be like. I like him. My prize was Grandpa Goodwin's Stories, for bringing the most scholars to Sunday-school. Santa Claus brought me a work basket, silver thimble, toilet set, pair of kid gloves, box of candy, scrap book and 'Jack and Jill.'" (I don't know Mr. Williams, so I can't tell if he is the man I am like or not.) J. Halbert Erb, Clarence, N. Y.; "I am 14 and wish to join the Av. S., but I do not know all the requirements." (Resolve to read 5 pp. of history and 30 lines of poetry per week, one Bible verse each day, memorize a good quotation each week; keep an account of your work in a note book, and at the end of 12 wks., send me your report.) Vera McCain, Memphis, Tenn.; "I would like to join the Av. S. 'Pete' is real good, but you quit right in the most interesting place. I am anxious to know how Pete got out of trouble. I hope success to the Society." Edith Foote, Eldon, Mo.; "Red Box Clew is a good story, but 'Pete' is the best. I am going to join the Av. S. I think Pete should have told the truth when her mother asked her where she had been. I am nine." Mrs. A. E. Major, Laurens, Ia.; "Lynne Major (11) and Alta Vandyrite (13) wish to join the Av. S. They wished to try for three months to see if they could keep the rules—they have succeeded and now ask me to report their names. We all like the story very much. You may also place my name on your list. I want to try how well I can keep the rules." Ethel Wheat, Aurora, Mo.; "I have been reading about the Av. S. for two years and I want to join. I am 13 and have celebrated the 20th Century by joining the Church of Christ. My favorite quotation; 'Take care of the happiness of others, And God will take care of yours.'" Bertha Hare, Dawn, Mo.; "I am 10, and became a member of the Christian Church last fall. My aunt Gertrude takes the EVANGELIST and I have been a devoted reader of it for a year. Red Box Clew was just splendid. And I am now reading 'Pete.' I have read a good many Av. S. Letters, and I would like to be a member. I am in the fifth reader and I love to go to school. I would like to have some correspondents and I would answer as soon." Anna Irons; "I am very sorry to say I have not kept the rules as I ought, but I will start in new. I like this story that you wrote this last time better than the Red Box Clew. I am 10, my birthday, Apr. 8th. Please tell Maud Braley that if I knew her address I would write to her. I will close for this time. Tell her my address is Miss Anna Irons, Monitor, Oreg."

Mabel Bridgwait, Renfrow, Okla., writes that her work has been a failure for the last quarter; "but I am going to join over new again." Henry S. Bagley, Mabelvale, Ark., joins the society and sends a guess on "Pete." "I have read With the Children," he says, "from beginning to end." Melvin Ledden, Ospur, Ill., has decided to begin again. "I have been on the Honor List four times, but in the summer neglected the Av. S." Geneva Brasier, Alton, Ill.; "I am eight years to-day (written on Feb. 11th) and I want to join the Av. S. We have taken the Evangelist ever since I can remember. I think you are very kind to take so much interest in the children. I like the story. I think Pete is a very nice girl, but I do not like nicknames. I feel sorry for Linda May. I think Nap is—" (There! I was about to tell her guess. I must be more careful!) "Mr. Ellis, this is your birthday, too, but I do not know how old you are. Good-by." I see my secret can no longer be kept. I must put the best face on the matter, and own up, just as if I didn't care. After all, turn about is fair play. You have all told me your age. Besides, you might think me older than I am, if I remain silent any longer, and though it may disappoint some to find that I am not a little boy, still, this is nothing for which I am to blame. I was born 1870, but I couldn't help it. But, sure enough, I am not—like most people—ashamed of having been so long in the world. It rather makes me feel good to think how many good dinners I have eaten, and how many books I have read and how many games I have played. One of the sweetest things that happened on my last birthday was getting a beautiful tie from one of our members—Florence Belle Beattie, Dover, Mo.; I have never met her, except in this page, and yet she thought of me, when a whole long row of my kinfolks never sent me a button. Not that I needed any buttons, however. Dear me! This article is growing so extremely personal that if I don't stop I shall be telling you about the lemon-ice I froze for my birthday dinner, and about the turkey and the chocolate cake—

What Shall We Eat

To Keep Healthy and Strong?

A healthy appetite and common sense are excellent guides to follow in matters of diet, and a mixed diet of grains, fruits and meats is undoubtedly the best, in spite of the claims made by vegetarians and food cranks generally.

As compared with grains and vegetables, meat furnishes the most nutriment in a highly concentrated form and is digested and assimilated more quickly than vegetables or grains.

Dr. Julius Remusson on this subject says: Nervous persons, people run down in health and of low vitality should eat plenty of meat. If the digestion is too feeble at first it may be easily strengthened by the regular use of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets after each meal. Two of these excellent tablets taken after dinner will digest several thousand grains of meat, eggs or other animal food in three or four hours, while the malt diastase also contained in Stuart's Tablets causes the perfect digestion of starchy foods, like potatoes, bread, etc., and no matter how weak the stomach may be, no trouble will be experienced if a regular practice is made of using Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets because they supply the pepsin and diastase so necessary to perfect digestion, and any form of indigestion and stomach trouble except cancer of the stomach will be overcome by their daily use.

That large class of people who come under the head of nervous dyspeptics should eat plenty of meat and insure its complete digestion by the systematic use of a safe, harmless digestive medicine like Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets composed of the natural digestive principles, peptones and diastase, which actually perform the work of digestion and give the abused stomach a chance to rest and to furnish the body and brain with the necessary nutriment. Cheap cathartic medicines masquerading under the name of dyspepsia cures are useless for relief or cure of indigestion because they have absolutely no effect upon the actual digestion of food.

Dyspepsia in all its forms is simply a failure of the stomach to digest food and the sensible way to solve the riddle and cure the indigestion is to make daily use at meal time of a safe preparation which is endorsed by the medical profession and known to contain active digestive principles, and all this can truly be said of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets.

All druggists throughout the United States, Canada and Great Britain sell them at the uniform price of fifty cents for full treatment.

Jesus and Caiaphas.*

The various accounts of the trial and condemnation of our Savior are likely to be confusing, unless we remember that each evangelist tells but a part of the story, and that the different narratives must be combined in order to a clear view of the events of this awful night of our Lord's humiliation. There were six stages in his trial. The first investigation was before Annas, the ex-high priest, and is told alone by John, 18:12-24. The second was before Caiaphas and some members of the Jewish council, or Sanhedrin, taking place before daylight, and is narrated by Matthew and Mark in the passages noted in this lesson. The third was before the entire Sanhedrin, in formal session and after daylight, and Luke alone gives us this account in chapter 22:66-71. The other three were the two before Pilate and the intervening one before Herod. The Jews would gladly have executed Jesus without any formal trial, and asking no favors of Pilate, but they dared not do so. The power of legal execution belonged to the Roman governor alone. Yet, to avoid clashing with the prejudices of the Jews, their rulers often winked at gross irregularities and Pilate did so on this occasion. The trial of Jesus was a mockery of justice throughout. He was practically condemned before he was brought to trial. He was treated with gross indignity after the preliminary examination, and before the regular court could sit, which was only after daylight. He was allowed no counsel for defense, nor any witnesses to sustain his innocence. The verdict of guilty and sentence of execution were pronounced and carried out on the same day. The presiding judge had already declared that he must die, before his trial. He had done nothing that the law made a capital offense. All these facts were ignored, in the blind and cruel hatred that moved his enemies, and this supremely brutal and lawless murder was carried through with a haste that was as indecent as it was illegal.

From the brief investigation before Annas, where the brutal blow of the officer gave assurance of the base spirit in which the trial was to be conducted, Jesus was sent to Caiaphas, the actual high priest at that time, who was waiting in his palace, with a group of the priests, scribes and elders, for the coming of the hated Nazarene. The Sanhedrin was composed of the heads of the 24 courses of the priesthood, certain scribes or rabbis, learned in the Scriptures and traditions of Israel, and a number of the elders, or chief men among the "laity" of the people. They numbered about seventy in all. For the most part they were dominated by the haughty Annas, who for many years had been the chief figure in Jerusalem. The high priesthood had been filled in succession by himself, his five sons and his son-in-law, Caiaphas. He was the real "power behind the throne" during all this time. We may well believe that there were at least three members of the Sanhedrin who bore no share in this dark plot against an innocent man, namely, Nicodemus, Joseph of Arimathea and Gamaliel. There were present the priests whose greed and selfishness he had rebuked; the elders, whose hypocrisy he had branded; the scribes, whose ignorance he had exposed; and the Sadducees, whose barren materialism he had confuted. The high priest, in his sacred robe, wearing the jewelled breastplate, with the names of the twelve tribes inscribed thereon and the golden mitre on his brow, with the inscription "Holiness unto the Lord," was about to condemn to death the Savior of Israel and to cast the shame of a felon's death upon him who was incarnate holiness itself.

*Lesson for March 10. Matt. 26: 57-68. Parallel passages: Mark 14:53-65.

There was no evidence whatever that Jesus had done aught against the law, either of Rome or Jerusalem. But he must die, that was already determined. So false witnesses were bribed and one by one told their stories, but these did not agree. Two who had been hired to repeat the same tale, of Jesus' threat against the temple, could not lie alike, and "every poisoned arrow of their carefully provided perjuries fell harmless at his feet, as though blunted on the diamond shield of his white innocence." The crafty Caiaphas saw defeat threatening his well-laid plot. Desperate, he did what neither law nor justice allowed and appealed direct to the prisoner, whether he was innocent or guilty of these charges. The Master deigned no reply. He would not bandy words with those who had already bade farewell to truth and right. Silent he stood and let his accusers gnash their teeth in vain and helpless rage.

Repressing for a moment his fury, Caiaphas put to Jesus the one question which he felt would surely bring from those silent lips a response. A question, too, that would perhaps enable them to find a sure ground of condemnation on the score of blasphemy. In solemn tones the high priest addressed the calm figure that stood silent and patient in the midst: "I adjure thee, by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God!" Life and death trembled in the balance, as they waited for his answer. Would he be silent, in the face of this solemn charge? No! For this cause had he come into the world, to bear witness unto the truth. This was his hour and the culmination of his self-testimony. His answer sprang from his lips like a sword from its scabbard. "Thou hast said: nevertheless, I say unto you, henceforth ye shall see the Son of man sitting at the right hand of power and coming on the clouds of heaven." What inordinate egotism, in the face of death! Or is it rather divine consciousness of the sure and speedy triumph of righteousness? Time sufficed to answer the question and these judges lived to see this innocent one whom they condemned becoming the spiritual ruler of a multitude of the chosen people. It is very possible that among the "multitude of priests" that "became obedient to the faith" soon after Pentecost, were some of these who joined in the cry, "He is worthy of death!" The high priest rent his sacred robe, as a sign of his horror at Jesus' blasphemy, but before the eyes of heaven the robe of his self-righteousness had been stripped from his soul, and he stood in all the naked ugliness of his hypocrisy and unbelief.

This verdict, irregular as it was, must be confirmed at a later meeting of the council, so the members went their ways, to wait the few hours until daylight would allow of formal action, of which Luke tells us, as already alluded to above. Meanwhile, the Savior is handed over to the cruel mercies of the officers and soldiers, who, taking their cue from the scene just witnessed in the court room, make sport of the silent sufferer, in ways that our hearts refuse to dwell upon. The hands they bound so tightly, until the cords cut into the flesh, were the hands that had healed the sick and raised the dead. The eyes they blindfolded had looked with tenderest compassion upon sinners and kindled with sympathy for the suffering. The lips they smote had spoken words of love to men and had calmed the winds and waves of Galilee. One word from them now and the splendors of the Mount of Transfiguration would have filled the chamber of his humiliation. One word, and the base menials who sported with his agony would have been blasted as by a breath from Jehovah. But he would not speak the word. He had come to save, not to destroy. The cup which was appointed him to drink he drained to the dregs and over the picture of his patient sufferings we draw the veil and silently weep.

Meanwhile, what of the disciples? Two only of them had followed the Master and his captors, Peter and John, the former lagging along at a distance. John, being acquainted at the high priest's palace, was admitted to its inner court and by his influence secured also the admission of Peter. The apostle who had been foremost in resisting the arrest of the Nazarene could not go unrecognized by some of those who had gone with the crowd to Gethsemane. Thrice was he questioned, whether he was not one of Jesus' followers, and thrice did he deny, at last with oaths most solemn. The awful strain under which he had been living had made him faint; and the impending death of his Lord cast its shadow over him until he became an arrant coward. Such moments of unreasoning dread sometimes come to the bravest souls. As the cock for the second time crowed outside the palace walls, the words of warning spoken by the Master on the way to Gethsemane began to force themselves through the stupor of Peter's mind, and lifting his head in sudden shock of recollection, he saw the sad, pitying eyes of Jesus fastened on his face. "Blessed are those on whom, when he looks in sorrow, the Lord also looks with love." The apostle's conscience smote him with dreadful remorse. Wrapping his cloak about his head, he rushed forth into the night, where even the stars seemed to be but a wilderness of eyes, all gazing down upon his shame and agony. "But, if the angel of innocence had left him, the angel of repentance took him gently by the hand," and he found peace and pardon in a merciful Savior's love. There is a beautiful tradition that, during his whole after life, Peter rose from slumber at the hour of his denial and prayed for pardon from his gracious and forgiving Lord. Thank God, he did not yield to despair, like Judas, but gave his years in service, and his life at last in martyrdom, for the Master whom he had once denied.

TOPIC FOR MARCH 10.

A Castaway.

(1 Cor. 9:24-27.)

Paul here uses the illustration of the race-course and of the games to throw light on the Christian life. He shows how hard the young men strive in the races, how carefully they train by being temperate in everything, and all for a wreath of green leaves that withers in a week. But we are engaged in a larger race, a sterner game, and for an imperishable crown. So run, then, that ye shall win.

Furthermore, there is a very definite aim to be kept in view. One should not run aimlessly. The variation of a hair's breadth from the true course may lose the race. One should not fight as one that beats the air; the wildness of a single blow may mean defeat. But the true spiritual athlete buffets his body, subdues it, lest he should, after preaching to others, be rejected.

There are those who preach against lawlessness and commit lawlessness. There are the saloon-smashers of Kansas, who aim at the observance of the laws and who break all the laws. There is set before us a very vivid illustration of the way in which a single lawless act creates others. One woman breaks the law and then others and others, till a furious mob of students led by a tomahawking preacher engage in a battle that ends, perhaps, in murder. No two wrongs ever create a right. Observance of law only can create respect for law.

The same thing can be said of lynchings. Within a week of the time of this writing, in the heart of the blue-grass of Kentucky, a barbarous act is performed to wipe out the stain of another barbarous act. This is against all law and all nature. If those who preach the keeping of the law would once keep the law and allow one of these terrible negro cases to take its course in the courts, more respect for law would be created in the hearts of the offenders than all the lynchings of the late years could create.

And all that applies to public matters of this sort will apply equally well to individual morality. More things are wrought by doing than by preaching. The all important question to be asked is not, what do you preach; but what do you do? It was, perhaps, not so much Paul's preaching of Christianity as his laborious journeys, his conscientious self-support, his facing of dangers, his overcoming enemies and obstacles in behalf of Christianity—it was these things, no doubt, that won people to him and to his plea.

So must it be with us Endeavorers. The question is not, what does the C. E. preach; but what does it do? Let us be careful that when we have preached to others, we ourselves are not rejected.

BOSS.

Mrs. Jane Boss was born near Liverpool, England, Dec. 13, 1825; died at the home of her son, J. P. Boss, in Joplin, Mo., Jan. 28, 1901, after an illness of eleven days. She crossed the Atlantic in a sailing vessel at 10 years of age. She lived in Illinois, Iowa, and last in Southwest Missouri, settling on Jones' Creek, in Newton county, in 1867. On March 24, 1899, we buried her husband. Since then she lived with her son, J. P. Boss. "Grandma" Boss was an earnest Christian for years: devoted wife, honored mother and pioneer citizen—beloved of all. "Favor is deceitful and beauty is vain, but a woman that feareth the Lord, she shall be praised."

W. F. TURNER.

DODGE.

Mrs. Margaret Dodge (Murphy) was born on Nov. 24, 1814, in Barren county, Ky., moved with her parents to Morgan county, Ill., and lived 27 years in Morgan and Warren counties, Ill. She was married to John M. Dodge March 7, 1836, and moved to Dallas county, Ia., in 1857, and has lived ever since on the farm where she died on the 12th of Feb., aged 86 years. She was the mother of nine children, four of whom survive her—R. D. Dodge, Mrs. D. D. VanMeter, Bernice Rall and H. H. Dodge. She has lived a faithful Christian for about 70 years. When the DeSoto Church was organized she, with her husband and children, became charter members. Soon after the organization of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions Auxiliary, of DeSoto, she became a member, and until her death took a never failing interest in its work. Two days before her death a delegation from that society presented her with a certificate of life membership. The funeral services, at the home of her son, R. D. Dodge, were conducted by the writer, assisted by Gilbert Ellis, of Adel. J. E. DENTON.

HUTCHISON.

Mrs. James Hutchison (nee Ann Eliza Harriman) was born in New Jersey, May 1, 1816, and departed this life very suddenly and unexpectedly Feb. 13, 1901. In 1839 she was married to Patrick Flarerty, and in the same year moved to Missouri. To this union one child survives. In 1857 she became the wife of James Hutchison, one of the pioneer citizens of this county. They were singularly happy in each other's love for 44 years. To this union there is also but one surviving child. Sister Hutchison was a woman of beautiful Christian character and spirit. Her life was unostentatious and home-loving, but it was a beautiful and blessed one in its impress upon family and friends alike. She will be sorely missed in the home, church and community, but inexpressibly so by dear Father Hutchison. FRANK W. ALLEN.

Chillicothe, Mo., Feb. 15, 1901.

JARRETT.

Mary Elizabeth Stephenson was born at Crittendon, Grant county, Ky., Oct. 22, 1832. She was born in a family famous for its fortitude and its faith. Her father and mother were among the first to identify themselves with the Reformers who were called out by the preaching of Barton W. Stone and Alexander Campbell in that section. Her uncle was Ezra K. Fish, well-known for his faith throughout the state. At sixteen she heard from the lips of the great Campbell, at her father's fireside, the story of redemption. It fired her heart, and at his own hands she obeyed the gospel. At nineteen she was married to Andrew M. Jarrett. They were blessed with three children—Lorena, who became Mrs. W. H. Sisler, and died in Emporia, Kas., in 1879; Allie, now Mrs. J. L. Thomas, of Emporia, and Wm. E. S. Jarrett, of the Boatmen's Bank in St. Louis. Eight grandchildren grieve. Of them, the two orphan daughters of Mrs. Sisler, Edna (Mrs. G. W. Sickles, of Winfield, Kas.), and Della, suffer keener loss, for in their bereavement they mourn for her who was mother as well as grandmother to them. They know, as only God can know beside, how faithful she was in that. In 1856, she with her husband emigrated to Missouri, locating at La Grange. While there she became widely known for her kind interest in the young men preparing in Canton for the gospel ministry. Many a man, now revered by an admiring brotherhood, can tell of her unselfish interest and encouragement. The writer has listened to her accounts of her glad ministering to the giants of our cause, in the days of their decline. How she has fed feeble old Raccoon John Smith with her own hands; how the great Campbell, Stone, Burnet, and others have sat at her table; how she worked in humbler spheres beside W. H. Hopson, B. H. Smith, D. P. Henderson, Jacob Creath, J. R. Lucas, Prof. Laughlin and J. H. Carter. She came to Kansas in 1879, settling at Emporia. Here her husband died in 1886. Here her declining days were spent with her dear ones. In the home of her daughter, she fell asleep on Feb. 1st. We laid her body to rest under God's white mantle during a sunny rift in the clouds.

LANGSTON.

John M. Langston was found dead in his bed at his home in Summum, Ill., Feb. 9, 1901. He was born Dec. 19, 1833, aged at time of death 67 years, 1 month and 20 days. His birthplace was Sangamon county, Ill. He was a soldier in the Civil War, a member of Company D, 151 Illinois Infantry, was honorably discharged Jan. 24, 1866. Was united in marriage with Miss Mary Shields Feb. 11, 1867. He united with the Christian Church at Summum, Ill., about five years ago at a meeting held by W. H. Boles. Funeral was held Feb. 10, at 2 P. M. in Summum Church by the writer. His wife and three children survive him. J. E. DEIHL.

LINTHECUM.

Died, in West Plains, Mo., Feb. 7, of pneumonia, Miss Jennie Linthecum, aged 52 years, she was born in Virginia and came to Missouri when a child and when seventeen obeyed the Savior. She assisted in organizing the church at Joplin and was, for thirteen years, a member there. Since coming to West Plains she had devoted her life to the care and maintenance of an aged, blind and helpless mother, and was a model of true Christian womanhood. No death here has caused such profound sorrow. M. L.

LONG.

Died, at Boydsville, Mo., Feb. 10, 1901, Miss Lillian Long, daughter of Bro. and Sister J. C. Long, aged 15 years and nine months. I was personally and well acquainted with her from infancy. She was a loving and dutiful daughter, a kind, affectionate sister. She was baptized by J. W. Coggins. The family, the church, the Sunday-school, the neighborhood all sadly miss her. I am sure that she will have a very bright crown in heaven.

J. C. REYNOLDS.

MILLER.

Mrs. Mercy A. Miller, nee Mead, was born Dec. 17, 1818, near Manchester, Dearborn Co., Ind., and died near Rolling Prairie, Ind., Feb. 2, 1901, aged 82 years, 1 month, and 19 days. In 1834 she came with her parents to Penn Township, St. Joseph Co., Ind., where, at that time the Indians largely outnumbered the white people. On Dec. 2, 1838, she was married to Adam Miller. To them were born eight children, six sons and two daughters. The father, with three sons and one daughter, preceded her to the other shore. At the age of 14 she professed her faith in Christ, was immersed in Tanner's Creek and united with the M. E. Church. Shortly after her marriage she with her husband united with the Baptist Church. A few years later they united with the Christian Church, of which they remained devoted members till summoned to cross over the river. Her last illness was of about two weeks' duration; there seemed to be no specific disease, but a general weakening, until finally the machinery of life that had run so long and so well refused to move any longer and she gently and peacefully passed away without a struggle. The funeral services, conducted by Bro. Denham, and interment took place in Mishawaka, Ind. The writer was for a time pastor of the congregation of which Sister Miller was a member, and my acquaintance with her covered a period of 17 years. Her life was an "open book," she was a sweet-spirited soul, always the same earnest, evenly balanced, everyday Christian, cheerfully enduring the "burden and heat of the day," and now the Lord has bidden her come up higher. She was a regular subscriber to and reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST almost from its founding. Bro. and Sister Miller's home was for many years the preachers' home, they were "given to hospitality." The preachers, their wives and children were welcome always. May the benediction of our kind heavenly Father rest upon the sorrowing members of the family and relatives who survive her.

ANEMIA

The face alone is no sure index of health; but headache and dizziness, no ambition, no force, no endurance, short breath, palpitation of the heart on little exertion—these with a pale face, are a clear indication of what is wrong. There is too little red in the blood.

There is too little vital force. It is life that is wanting.

Scott's emulsion of cod-liver oil supplies it.

We'll send you a little to try, if you like.

PICKRELL.

James Henry Pickrell died at Springfield, Ill., Feb. 12, 1901, after three days' illness of appendicitis, his age being 66 years and 11 months. He was an honored member of one of the most widely known families in Sangamon county and central Illinois, a family which has been prominently connected with the work of the Christian Church in Illinois and elsewhere. After his marriage September 20, 1860, to Margaret T. Bedford, of Paris, Ky., they settled on a farm at Harristown, Ill., where he engaged extensively in the raising and importing of fine cattle and became a recognized authority in that enterprise. In 1884 he was elected secretary and treasurer of the American Shorthorn Breeders' Association and moved to Chicago to take charge of the work of that office and later to Springfield. He was one of the most faithful Christian workers I have ever known. Always at his post, willing to assume the hardest tasks, always cheerful, hopeful, full of faith, and forgetful of self. For ten years he served as elder of the Central Christian Church, Chicago. He was a member of the World's Congress Committee of the Disciples. At the time of his death he was chairman of the Board of Deacons of the church at Springfield. He is survived by his wife, four sons, Harry E. Pickrell, Chicago, Dr. W. B., Henry A., and Scott Pickrell, of Springfield, and three daughters, Mrs. Dr. Howard Crutcher, Mrs. C. H. Jones, both of Chicago, and Mrs. C. S. Medbury, of Angolo, Ind. His body was laid to rest in the Pickrell family cemetery at Mechanicsburg, Ill. He was a man whose place no one can fill.

REYNOLDS.

Died, at Boydsville, Mo., Jan. 30, 1901, my little grandson, James Wilkerson Reynolds, aged one year, three months and five days. His body, to us so precious, lies by the side of that of his little sister, Helen May Reynolds, who died March 18, 1899, aged four years and six months. Bright, beautiful, precious darlings! How we love them though gone from us! But Jesus loves them, too. Mother, father, grandfather heart-broken! Yet not without hope. We expect to join them in the "Father's House." There is no death there. J. C. REYNOLDS.

Book Notes.

We yet have a few copies of our special Bagster Teacher's Bible—"Bagster 8325"—which we sell at $2.00. This is the finest Bible ever offered anywhere for so little. The regular retail price is $5.00. The actual cost of the Bible to us at wholesale was considerably more than $2.00. "Bagster 8325" is printed in minion type, is full leather lined, silk sewed, and contains all the popular helps—concordance, tables, chronological charts, maps, etc. It is a magnificent bargain.

We regret that we must withdraw our offer of the Standard Dictionary. Our stock is exhausted, and we can obtain no more to sell at half price. We are very sorry always when we have to return orders, but our offer was so attractive and our stock so limited that it was inevitable that some would be disappointed. It was a case of "first come, first served." We could easily dispose of 500 more sets of the Standard Dictionary if we had them or could get them. It is well for our patrons to make immediate response to our special offers. Glancing over the list of purchasers of the dictionary, we note that the first set went to New York (state) and the last set to Texas. So wide is our business!

Our latest special offer is to send thirty-five choice pamphlets and tracts selected from the list in our catalogue, and all different, for one dollar. We cannot take the space to give a list of titles. Many of the thirty-five are substantial booklets of 30 and 40 pages.

☞Just write your order, asking for "thirty-five tracts for one dollar" and enclose it to us with a one-dollar bill. By accepting this offer you secure a good deal of first-class Christian literature for very little money.

"Here is a book that has been of more practical help to me than any other ten books I possess, excepting only the Bible," said a young preacher to us, placing his hand on a copy of The Old Faith Restated. Nor did he speak extravagantly. It would be difficult to over-state the value and importance of this volume, which is the result of the labors of seventeen of the ablest men in our brotherhood. The plan and scope of the volume is generally known and is indicated in the title. It is a clear, complete statement of our position regarding the fundamental doctrines and the ordinances of Christianity and the Church—in other words a setting forth of the teaching and practice of the Disciples of Christ. It should have a place in the home of every Disciple. Price, cloth, illustrated, $2.00.

Notes From Northern Indiana.

I am at South Milford, LaGrange county, 20 miles from the Michigan line. I came a week ago in answer to a call for a protracted meeting. Delivered popular lectures Friday and Saturday nights and have been preaching day and night since.

I stopped at Richmond and Kendallville on the way and found work prospering in both places. My former friend from Kentucky, E. V. Spicer, is at Richmond, and Erastus Conner at Kendallville. Stopping only an hour or two, I did not get to see Bro. Spicer, but he is quite well received there. Stayed over night with Bro. Conner, through whose agency I received this call. He is in a meeting and made me preach to the fine audience he had assembled. The brethren there have a beautiful house of delightful acoustics, and as the attention was of the most refined and respectful sort I enjoyed speaking there.

South Milford church is only about four years old, and its meeting place is in the old brick schoolhouse worked over into a good-looking church edifice. They are carrying their own load, supplying their own fuel and lights and paying for their own meeting. As their number is small they deserve much commendation. Bro. Wesley Diggins, of Kendallville, has been preaching for them twice a month for a year or two, free. They have a good Sunday-school. It is a field white unto the harvest, and I look for good results.

A Child's Thought of God.

They say that God lives very high!
But if you look above the pines
You cannot see our God. And why?

And if you dig down in the mines
You never see him in the gold,
Though, from him, all that's glory shines.

God is so good, he wears a fold
Of heaven and earth across his face—
Like secrets kept, for love, untold.

But still I feel that his embrace
Slides down by thrills, through all things made,
Through sight and sound of every place:

As if my tender mother laid
On my shut lids her kisses' pressure,
Half-waking me at night; and said
"Who kissed you through the dark, dear guesser?"

IT is significant that in homes of wealth where the very best is demanded, Ivory Soap is used in the nursery. "Bells of Easter-Tide"

A Beautiful New Concert Service For Easter Sunday . . . . . .

It is now only a short time until Easter Sunday. It is time to prepare for any special service which your Sunday-school will have upon that occasion. Do not wait until the last moment, but begin in time. Easter Day should be made beautiful with music and flowers.

"Bells of Easter-Tide" is a concert service, including music, recitations and appropriate selections from the Scriptures. The songs are by W. J. King and W. E. M. Hackleman. The poems and recitations are the work of Birdie Bell, E. E. Hewitt and Jennie Wilson. Both the authors and composers have done their work excellently.

"Bells of Easter-Tide" makes a pamphlet of sixteen pages, with a handsomely designed Easter cover. The price for single copy is five cents; per dozen, fifty cents, postpaid. Send the publishers five cents at once for a sample copy.

Once again, let us warn all our Sunday-school friends that the time is short. Easter Sunday comes on April 7, or in about four weeks from the present time. Not a day should be lost. "Bells of Easter-Tide" is not a difficult exercise, but time and careful preparation are required to satisfactorily present the simplest service.

Current Events.

Our New President. Under heavy skies, but with as favorable weather as one has a right to expect on March 4, Mr. McKinley was again inaugurated as President of the United States. The rain which fell while the President was delivering his inaugural address may be interpreted as nature's tears of joy or tears of sorrow, according to one's political point of view, but what it really indicated was the folly of attempting to have a great out-of-door function at this season when decent weather is the infrequent exception. The Father of his Country knew what he was about when he postponed his inauguration until April 30. The inaugural ceremonies are described as being of unusual elaborateness. A feature of the parade was the presence of a larger number of soldiers and sailors than had ever before participated in an inaugural procession. The President's address contained a summary of what had been done during the past four years and an outline of the policy which will be followed during the new administration. Cuba must be established as a "free and independent government, prepared to assume and perform the obligations of international law which now rest upon the United States under the treaty of Paris." The recent act of Congress in adopting the Platt resolution was approved. There is to be no change in policy in the Philippines. "We are not waging war against the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands. A portion of them are making war against the United States. By far the greater part of the inhabitants recognize American sovereignty and welcome it as a guarantee of order and of security for life, property, liberty, freedom of conscience and the pursuit of happiness. To them only protection will be given. They shall not be abandoned. We will not leave the destiny of the loyal millions in the Islands to the disloyal thousands who are in rebellion against the United States." Immediately before the inauguration of the President, Mr. Roosevelt took the oath of office as Vice-President in the Senate Chamber and, after a brief inaugural address, presided for a few minutes over that assembly.

Congress. A great deal of important legislation was acted upon in the closing days of Congress. Though there were night sessions and in some cases all-night sessions, it was remarked a few days before the close that the work of Congress was farther advanced than it usually is at that time. The Spooner amendment to the army appropriation bill provides for the establishment of civil government in the Philippines. It is still left largely to the President to determine the form which that government shall take. Under its authorization a civil governor will soon be appointed, probably Judge Taft, to whom the military commander will be subordinate. An amendment introduced by Senator Hoar restricts the sale of public lands and the granting of franchises and concessions. The Platt amendment in regard to our relations with Cuba, as summarized last week, was accepted both by the House and the Senate on a strictly party vote and both the Cuban and Philippine amendments became law with the passage and signing of the army appropriation bill. The sundry civil bill, freed from its exposition amendments, was passed at the last moment. The river and harbor appropriation bill succumbed under the fight which was made on it in the House and failed of passage.

World's Fair Bill Signed. One of the last official acts of the President in his first administration was the signing of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition bill a few minutes before noon, March 4. The passage of the bill was not secured without a desperate struggle, in spite of the fact that at its last session Congress had promised the appropriation on conditions which were recognized as having now been fulfilled. After the House had refused to concur in the Tillman and Teller amendments, the Senate attached the whole exposition matter to the sundry civil bill as an amendment carrying $5,000,000 for the St. Louis World's Fair, $500,000 for the Buffalo Pan-American, and $250,000 for the Charleston Exposition. The House again failed to concur because of objection to the Charleston feature, and the whole bill was sent to conference with a chance that it would stay there until adjournment and, by the failure of the sundry civil appropriation, force an extra session of Congress. An all-night session was held Sunday night, and early on the last morning the case looked blue for the bill, but at last Senator Tillman's objection was overcome, and the Senate took up and passed the original bill, which had been first passed by the House. The World's Fair of 1903 is therefore assured.

The Right of Intervention. The Cuban Constitutional Convention is evidently in a state of embarrassment. It has finished its work, with the exception of agreeing upon a statement of the relations between Cuba and the United States. The United States government has adopted as law a resolution which makes no demands, but simply states that when certain conditions have been fulfilled, the government of the island will be turned over to the organization which has fulfilled them. But the Constitutional Convention does not agree to the conditions and is delaying its adjournment apparently in the hope that something may turn up. As a partial attempt to meet the requirements, a preamble has been drawn up and adopted stating the following points: That the Cuban government will make no treaty with any power limiting its own independence or alienating any of its territory; that it will not permit its territory to serve as a basis for foreign military operations; that it accepts the treaty of Paris and undertakes to do all that is required of the United States in that treaty; that it recognizes as valid the acts of the American military government and all rights acquired under them; the commercial relations between the two countries should be based on reciprocity. These concessions fall short of the demands of the United States because they do not grant to our government the right to take steps which may conceivably be necessary to insure the preservation of just and stable government in Cuba. The United States has guaranteed to the world that certain results will follow its intervention in driving Spain out of Cuba. The Platt resolution demands that the Cuban government shall recognize our right to see to it that the government which is to be established shall meet the requirements. This preamble assures us that everything will be all right, but does not recognize our authority to make things right in case the new government fails. To grant the right of intervention in emergency is not an assumption of inefficiency, any more than the giving of security for borrowed money is an assumption of the dishonesty or bankruptcy of the borrower. All the United States can reasonably ask of Cuba is a guarantee or security that certain things will be done. A simple assurance such as this preamble contains is insufficient.

Sampson's Break. The Sampson-Schley controversy, always an acrimonious and odious dispute, has taken on new heat since there are naval appointments to be made. Sampson has damaged his case materially by an utterance, thoroughly irrelevant to the main issue, in regard to the promotion of a gunner to the rank of ensign. By stating coldly and clearly that gunners, even though they may have sufficient technical education, usually have not the social qualifications which a naval officer should possess, Admiral Sampson has stirred up a hornet's nest. It is permitted to Americans, both officers and civilians, to act as snobbishly as they please without exciting much unfavorable comment, but what we cannot stand is the utterance of a snobbish sentiment, especially in black and white. Admiral Sampson's comment in regard to the social qualifications of naval officers was simply a calm and impolitic statement of an actual condition. It represents the actual opinion of probably the vast majority of the service, but most of them are politic enough to express the sentiment in the intangible and unquotable language of shrugs and glances, and certainly do not embody it in their official communications. This view of the qualifications of naval officers may be all wrong; we think it is. But Admiral Sampson, by merely accepting and stating a condition of affairs which others have created, is likely to get more than his share of the blame.

The Year in Germany. The events of the past twelve months, political and otherwise, in the German empire are summarized in an article in the Atlantic Monthly by one well acquainted with the situation. At the beginning of last year the most prominent feature in German public opinion was enthusiastic sympathy for the Boers, but this has undergone modification in spite of the stimulating effect of President Kruger's visit, until what remains is based upon a traditional antipathy to Great Britain rather than a belief in the justice of the Boer cause or expectation of profit from a possible re-establishment of their government. The dispatch of an expedition of 23,000 troops to China was a remarkable event in view of the fact that not more than 1,000 German soldiers had ever before been across the sea at one time. In spite of criticism by the press, the expedition commanded a considerable degree of popular sympathy and even developed a wave of jingoism, which was encouraged by the appointment of a German commander-in-chief over the allied forces. The retirement of Prince Hohenlohe as imperial chancellor was not greatly regretted, as he had never been considered more than a temporary incumbent in that office, and the appointment of Count von Buelow as his successor was well received. The first task of the new chancellor was to quiet the Reichstag which was excited over the emperor's encroachment upon its constitutional prerogative in dispatching the expedition to China without the consent of the legislative body. Von Buelow showed himself a master of the situation by stilling this storm quickly and completely.

Germany and America. The relations between Germany and the United States have improved during the year. The discussion of the application of the "most favored nation" clause has been settled by our agreeing to the German view. The examination of dried fruit imported into Germany, ostensibly as a sanitary measure, but really as a prohibitory measure, has been discontinued. The meat bill, which was backed by the Agrarians and had for its leading feature a blow at the importation of American meat, under the guise of sanitary inspection, was passed after its most objectionable clauses had been eliminated. The opening of a German trans-Atlantic cable gives Germany access to American news untainted by passing through England. The floating of a loan of $20,000,000 in New York for the German government was a marked reversal of the previous financial relations of the two countries. After much insistence by the Kaiser, a law has been passed which will practically double the German navy. The last step in currency reform, completely establishing the gold standard, was taken by the passage of a law decreasing the volume of legal tender silver (the old thalers) and increasing the volume of legal tender silver (marks and fractional currency). The so-called Lex Heinze, providing a rigorous censorship over literary and dramatic productions, was the subject of a vast amount of debate, and was finally passed in a weakened form. The general political situation shows an increasing prominence of the Social Democratic party, accompanied by a tendency toward moderation and conservatism. They are willing "to take their millennium on the installment plan." In education the important movements have been the placing of English in the gymnasia (high schools) in a more prominent position even than French, instead of on a par with Hebrew as heretofore, the opening of many gymnasia for women, and the lengthening of the medical course to five years.

Death of Ex-Senator Evarts. Ex-Senator William M. Evarts died at his home in New York city on Thursday, Feb. 28, at the age of eighty-three years. His advanced age and increasing feebleness rendered his death no surprise to those who knew him. Mr. Evarts was born in Boston in 1818. His father, also a Bostonian by birth and a graduate of Yale, was the editor of the Missionary Herald and throughout his long life the son maintained a lively interest in foreign missions. He was graduated from Yale College in the class of 1837, with former Chief Justice Waite and Prof. Benjamin Silliman, attended the Harvard Law School and began the practice of law in New York, where he soon became United States district attorney. He was a Republican from the organization of the party, but in the days immediately before the war he held the conservative opinions of Seward as opposed to the more radical policy of Lincoln. After Lincoln's nomination, however, he found a firm supporter in Evarts. He was appointed secretary of state under President Hayes after brilliantly advocating his cause vs. Tilden before the electoral commission. In 1885 he was elected United States Senator from New York and retired after a single term. Throughout his career, though he held high offices, he was rather the lawyer than the statesman. The practice of his profession was the foundation of his reputation and the source of his keenest delight. He was the principal attorney for the defense of President Johnson at the time of his impeachment, was counsel for the United States in the settlement of the "Alabama" claims by arbitration, and was chief counsel for Henry Ward Beecher in his famous trial. In railroad matters and points of law relating to corporations, he was an eminent authority. Up to the time of his retirement, ten years ago, it is said that his fees were the highest on record.

The End of the War? Dispatches from London and South Africa are eagerly encouraging the opinion that the Boer war is practically over, but the public, which has a lively memory of hurrahing for that event once, only to find next week that the fight was still on, will not throw up its hat until the returns are all in. It is known for certain that De Wet has left Cape Colony and is in the region north of Colesburg. But whether this should be characterized as a retreat or an escape, one can scarcely say. At all events, it appears that the invasion of Cape Colony brought no good to the Boer cause, and occasioned disaffection among some of its friends. The capture of 200 Boers lately reported by Gen. Kitchener is offset by the capture of 80 British from a scouting party. A report that Gen. Botha had surrendered was current for several days, but has been shown to be untrue. The process of driving tacks with a sledge-hammer is always difficult and expensive and the British have been at the same disadvantage in their recent operations against the depleted but still shifty ranks of their enemy. One is almost sure to smash one's thumb with so unwieldy an instrument, before the tack is in, but by and by it is driven, somewhat to the detriment of the tack and much to the disfigurement of the furniture. So it is in South Africa.

Brevities. Thirty-six lives were lost in an accident in the Diamondville mine in Wyoming.

Pope Leo celebrated his ninety-first birthday last Sunday.

A tin can combination has been effected with a capitalization of $10,000,000.

St. Louis has a new chief of police, Matthew Kiely, in place of John W. Campbell.

Frank A. Vanderlip, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, has resigned his position and will be succeeded by Milton E. Ailes.

A national convention of Spiritualists is being held in Chicago. "Seein' Things at Night" might be suggested as a suitable hymn for opening the services.

It has been officially announced that the new steel corporation will have $400,000,000 of common stock, an equal amount of preferred stock and will issue $300,000,000 of bonds. Total, $1,100,000,000.

The adjournment of Congress again finds the Nicaragua canal bill on the list of very unfinished business. Senator Morgan in his advocacy of it is a marvel of unrewarded patience. The bill will probably outlast him.

The feature of the week in China has been the protest of the powers against the secret negotiations which have been going on in St. Petersburg between Russia and China with a view to the establishment of more complete Russian control over Manchuria.

The Republican primaries, preparatory to the city election in St. Louis, are being held on Tuesday of this week with a probability of the nomination of George W. Parker for Mayor. In this case we will have two respectable candidates, Mr. Wells and Mr. Parker of the Democratic and Republican parties respectively, supported by two corrupt machines. Both will have a considerable following of independent voters.

A wholesale raid was made on New York gambling houses Tuesday night of last week. The recent reorganization of the police department, substituting a commissioner of police with two deputies for a bipartisan board of four members, promises reform and shows some spasmodic indications of it, but so long as ex-Chief Devery, the most prominent among the corruptionists, remains first deputy, there is little hope for a genuine reform.

The Value of Theology.

A recent writer in one of our religious papers attempts to make two points: First, that Alexander Campbell's theology was not unduly influenced by Locke's philosophy; second, that Alexander Campbell did not have a theology at all. If the second of these propositions is true, the first certainly must be. But it is not necessary to go the length of denying that Mr. Campbell had a theology in order to disprove the proposition that he was unduly influenced by the philosophy of Locke or of any one else. So far as we know, no one has ever made such a statement, much less "industriously circulated" it. Those who have taken an interest in considering the relation of Campbell to Locke have, for the most part, maintained that the influence which the philosopher exerted upon the thinkers of that time was entirely legitimate and that they could not help using in their thinking, theological and otherwise, those concepts and principles which his philosophy had developed. This imputation of "undue influence" can be maintained only by assuming that any influence of philosophy upon theology is undue, and this is a statement which has certainly never been made by those who argue that Campbell was a Lockian.

In maintaining that Mr. Campbell had no theology, the article in question says: "Campbell never wrote a book of theology. . . . . It would be as appropriate to write a book on Paul's theology or Christ's theology as on Campbell's theology." Setting aside the fact that Paul and Christ and Alexander Campbell occupied somewhat different positions in regard to their inspiration, it may be admitted that this statement is substantially correct. What is the objection to writing a book upon Paul's theology—that is to say, Paul's teaching about God? If Christ had written a book, it would be equally pertinent to write about Christ's theology; as he did not, we must content ourselves with the theology of the gospels—and good books have been written on that, too.

But when one speaks of Campbell's theology there is apt to be a small panic on the part of those who think that this means that he formulated a creed or sought to construct a theology which should be used as an instrument of salvation in place of the gospel of Christ. And this imaginary danger is apt to be met by such statements as this: "The world had tried theologies and dogmas in vain. It needed a gospel instead." Nothing could be truer than this latter statement; no one appreciated this truth more thoroughly than Mr. Campbell; and no one recognizes his appreciation of it more heartily than those who maintain that he had a theology. The essential criticism which Mr. Campbell made upon the religious world of his day was aimed not at its possession of theologies but at its use of them. The world's need of a long obscured gospel does not mean that theology has henceforth no value. The removal of it from its usurped place as the means and criterion of salvation does not mean its destruction.

If the niceties of natural science were so emphasized that poor, ignorant humanity could get no inspiration from the beauty of the flowers, no uplift from the unlearned contemplation of the majesty of the stars, the need would not be for the abolition of botany and astronomy, but for the reduction of them to their proper place as sciences. So the need of the religious world at the beginning of this century was not for the destruction of theology, but for the placing of it in its proper position and the assignment of its proper function to it.

In past centuries the science of astronomy was the slave of the church, and Galileo spent years in prison because of the alleged conflict between his scientific opinions and the ecclesiastical dogmas. Since that time the church has learned that astronony can serve her better free than as a slave. Geology was once the slave of the church and he who found evidences that the age of the earth was more than 6,000 years must keep silence or incur her displeasure. The church has learned that geology can serve her more efficiently free than as a slave. Theology likewise had long been both the tyrant and the slave of the church: tyrant because its statement of human opinions supplanted the Gospel of Christ as the subject-matter for preaching and as the criterion for church membership; slave because each thinker was compelled to square his theological views with the elaborate creed of his church under pain of ecclesiastical displeasure. But the church is finding that theology can serve her better as a free science, leaving herself free to spread the Gospel of Christ for the salvation of the world. To-day among the most enlightened religious bodies, including our own, theological thought is freed from its ecclesiastical leading-strings, and the church, no longer finding its chief activity in the preservation of its ancient theology, is free to work for the salvation of sinners through the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is alone effective to that end.

Alexander Campbell was a consummate theologian, not only because he had a theology based on the best thought of his time but because he put theology in its proper place and assigned to it its rightful function. The church which uses up its vital energy in restraining its individual members from the consideration of theology at all, is in a condition not far different from that of the church which authoritatively defends its theological system. The dogmatism of "no theology" may be as tyrannical as the most elaborate formulation of doctrine.

As a restatement of what has already been said in regard to Mr. Campbell's noncreedal use of his theology, the closing paragraph of the volume on Alexander Campbell's Theology may here be quoted:

"And, after all, the most important and significant point about Alexander Campbell's theology was the use which he made of it. It was not a creed. It was not claimed to be a statement of all truth. It was not the theology of a church. It was simply ALEXANDER CAMPBELL'S THEOLOGY."

A Catholic paper, boasting of the universality of Romanism, cites the fact that, of the thirty-four members of the diplomatic corps at Washington representing the nations with which our government has official relations, twenty-three are Catholics. This statement by itself sounds very impressive, but unfortunately the paper goes on to name the countries which are Catholic and those which are Protestant, and one notices at a glance that the Catholic countries are the ones which are cutting the smallest figure in the history of modern civilization; they are the ones in which there is the greatest amount of illiteracy; there is not even a first-class political power on the list, unless one includes France, which is open to suspicion in regard to both political importance and Catholic orthodoxy. Catholic Austria is a conglomerate empire in constant danger of dissolution by reason of the racial antipathies among its component parts. Italy is Catholic, but the government has not been on speaking terms with the hierarchy for a generation. Catholic Spain has within a fortnight witnessed for the hundredth time an anti-clerical riot which necessitated martial law. The South American republics form a majority of the Catholic countries and in a mere count Chile shows up as much as the whole British Empire.

A writer in the Christian Courier on the subject, "Does the Plea of Our Fathers Need Modification?" begins an article by saying, "It needs to be restudied." In that single sentence there is a vast amount of truth. There are too many who do not know what the plea of our fathers really was. Some of them, perhaps, think it ought to be modified and others that it ought not, but neither opinion is of any consequence unless one knows just what it was. We have reached that stage in our history where it is easy and natural to seek to modify the plea of our fathers. Such a period is always fraught with danger. At such a time the safest conservation will be found in a renewed study of our fathers in the faith, that we may know better their spirit and their times as well as their doctrines. The work of the Bethany C. E. Reading Course for the next three months will deal with the history and work of the Disciples. Now is a good time to begin the study.

One is apt to be considerably impressed on hearing that the present King of England can trace his genealogy back in a direct line to William the Conqueror, and there are many persons of less exalted station who pride themselves on having noble or royal names on their ancestral tree. To hear them speak of it, one would think they descended from these alone. It is a fact fairly well authenticated that the average person has, or has had, two parents, four grandparents, eight great grandparents, sixteen of the next generation, and so on. Allowing three generations to the century, we may say that about twenty-five generations separate our day from William the Conqueror, and by a simple calculation in geometrical progression one will find that King Edward VII, or any one else for that matter, has 33,574,912 ancestors of the generation to which William the Conqueror belonged. Some allowance is to be made, of course, for duplicates, where the intermarriage of more or less remote relatives gives the same ancestors on both sides of the house. But in any case there were several million eleventh-century barbarians to whom the ancestry of King Edward could be traced quite as directly as to the Conqueror if anybody had cared to keep the records. The blood of the first William is in his viens—yes, the fraction of a corpuscle.

Hour of Prayer.

Renewal of Strength.

TEXT.—But they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary; they shall walk and not faint.—Isa. 40:31.

The servants of God are sustained in all their undertakings, and rewarded for their fidelity. Are they sent on some distant mission? God goes with them. Are heavy burdens laid upon them? He giveth power to the faint.

Exhaustion Unavoidable.

They that toil must grow weary. The farmer on his broad acres, the carpenter amidst his tools, the teacher, the preacher, the housekeeper—all who put forth honest effort grow weary. The same law asserts itself in spiritual things. Hope deferred makes the heart sick. In the service of God and fellow-man, you may husband your resources, be never so economical with your energies, and yet if you strive to do your duty, you will grow tired. It is in moments of weariness that temptation comes with redoubled force. For your own safety, as well as for continued usefulness, your strength must be renewed. Do not blunder by trying to keep on after your energies have been consumed. Your weariness is a gentle reminder of your dependence upon God.

Source of Strength.

"The Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid?"—Ps. 27:1. It is only the human that is consumed. God "fainteth not, neither is weary." We need to be reminded of this fact. Earthly fathers are strong, and wise, and patient, but they stagger under the burdens of anxiety and grief their children sometimes lay upon them. You cannot stagger the Almighty; you cannot exhaust Omnipotence. He is the famed "Rock of Ages." All nature is obedient to His decree; He stays the tumbling billows, and calms the raging winds. "He toucheth the hills, and they smoke." He it is that planteth and plucketh up nations, and giveth wisdom to kings. How foolish for the wicked to say, "Let us break his bands asunder, and cast away his cords from us!" How foolish and unfilial for his children to try to serve Him in their own strength, and in their own wisdom to proclaim His glory.

While God is infinite in might, and cooperates with His servants, thus helping forward His great purposes, He likewise imparts strength to them that trust Him. This fact is forever embalmed in one of our best words—enthusiasm; literally, God in us. "It is God that worketh in us," declares one who had learned to wait upon Him. There is solidity and strength in the rock, and from it waters gush forth for the refreshment of tired pilgrims.

Waiting Upon the Lord.

Rushing headlong into the work of the Master, eager and zealous, we soon spend our shallow force. We are putting our trust, not in Egypt and her chariots, but in Organization and her wheels. Instead of waiting upon the Lord, many churches are waiting upon a great evangelist. To be sure, we cannot dispense with machinery, nor can we do without trained specialists; but we can so order our work that these will not come between us and God. On the other hand, they will be the humble channels through which divine power may flow.

People who are full of energy are in especial need of this exercise. The Salvation Army has what is called a "knee drill"; we need a drill in waiting. The quiet hour,—where in all the twenty-four is it? The shout and tumult of the street, jingling door-bells, processions of callers, committee meetings without end, and the clarion calls of those who think they need us, leave scarcely a moment for meditation. But the busier we are, the more we need the soothing and invigorating atmosphere of the quiet hour. Closet prayer is helpful, but there should be a time when there is no voice of petition or praise, no uplifted hand, no soldierly tread, only the waiting, inquiring, listening attitude of a soul in the presence of God.

Power of Achievement.

He who practices the presence of God, he who waits on the Lord, will find aspirations mounting up like eagles; his thoughts will run swiftly into the knowledge of God, and he will walk in the way of His commandments. Weights will become wings, and stumbling-blocks stepping-stones. He will be like a fruitful tree, by the rivers of water. Strength received will be expended in fruitful service, and this expenditure will create still more strength. Formidable tasks will appear easy; faith will grow strong; resources will be multiplied, and victories gained. The soul will press swiftly on, "from strength to strength."

Prayer.

Worn and wearied with the burden and heat of the day, we come to Thee, O God, for rest. Do Thou bend o'er us, and refresh our lagging energies. The triumphs we have won in the past we won in Thy strength; Thou hast never failed us. Wilt Thou still be to us the shadow of a great rock in a weary land, the guide and inspiration of all our activities. Amen.

Editor's Easy Chair.

On a rustic seat placed between two trees which have overgrown the ends of the board, with other trees behind for a back rest, on the shore overlooking Mobile Bay, while the waves are singing a lullaby at our feet, we are penning these lines for the Easy Chair. A mile south of us toward the gulf is the village post-office and boat-landing. Another mile north of us near the shore are the remains of what is known as the "Old Village," consisting of some scattered bricks, some open spaces in which houses once stood, some of the pieces of asphalt walks and one or two decaying frames of buildings which once were the habitations of men. These are the mournful reminders of a civilization which once existed on this shore, but which is now extinct. Forty years ago in that period described by the freedmen of the south as "Fo' de wah," there were lordly mansions along the shore of the bay, and constituting that earlier Daphne, inhabited in the summer season by wealthy slaveholders. The houses, for the most part, seem to have been burned or otherwise destroyed during the war, for Farragut's fleet came into this bay and shelled the village, and some of the houses yet standing bear the marks of shells from his gunboats. The last battle of the war, fought after peace had been made, is said to have been fought on the shore of this bay above Daphne, before the news of the surrender of the southern armies was received. The wealth of these slaveholders was destroyed as one of the results of the war, and trees and underbrush have grown up and almost obliterated what were once abodes of wealth and luxury. And this is only forty years! Is it strange that great changes have taken place in the cities and towns that clustered about the Sea of Galilee nineteen centuries ago? Capernaum is marked by an interrogation point on the map. Conquerors came and went and left ruin behind them. One looks at the ruins of the Roman forum. Man raised those palaces and the wrath of man has laid them low, but the Tiber still rolls turbid through the Campagna. The Acropolis is in decay, but Mars Hill stand sand Mount Hymettus, with its honey and bees, is unchanged. What man has made man may destroy in forty years or less, but forty centuries can not touch God's handiwork.

Near the Old Village, and between that and the bay, is an immense grapevine, said to be about five feet in circumference—we did not have our tapeline with us—which has sent out its branches over all the surrounding trees, encircling them as the mythical serpent did Laocoon and his sons. The vine is now dead. Some boys ran a wild animal into the hollow of its trunk, and they chopped a hole in it and set fire to it to smoke out the beast, unmindful of the fact that they were destroying the life of one of the largest vines of the world—a rival in size if not in historic renown of that one which grows in Hampton Court, London. But this vine is visited by nearly all the people who come to Daphne, and is not without its romance. About five years ago a Spanish vessel appeared in the bay one evening and anchored out opposite this vine. Some men got into a small boat and rowed to the shore. This was repeated the next evening, and the vessel departed for good. In a few days it was discovered that a large hole had been dug near this vine and left unfilled and that something too heavy to carry had been taken out and dragged down the side of the hill to the bay. A chart which had been left in the hurry marked the place where a large amount of Spanish gold had been hidden. There were four large cedar trees forming almost a complete square, one of these supporting the trunk of the immense vine, and at the foot of another the treasure was buried. The hole is there yet in proof of the truthfulness of the story! But no one questions the facts as herein stated so far as we have heard. What romance or tragedy is connected with this hidden gold? Some day when we have nothing better to do we may write a "historical novel," founded on this incident. We have a cedar cane, which, with the aid of a friend, who did most of the work, we made from one of the cedar trees which supported this vine and sheltered these Spanish coins through—who knows how many years?

Some day, we venture to predict, this shore is again to be lined with elegant mansions built by men of the north, seeking a warmer climate in winter, and probably by men of the south seeking a cooler situation in summer. In pure, soft spring water, we know of no place which can rival it. It is much higher than Mobile across the bay, and for absolute quietness and restfulness it is all that can be desired. The sounds that greet one's ears on waking in the morning are the songs of the birds which seem to have adopted the groves along this bay as their winter resort. It may be that the robins and thrushes we have been charmed with here are the very fellows that do duty for us in the more northern regions later on. We have been enjoying a delightful ride to-day—wife and I—in company with Col. Hord and wife, through the splendid pine forests back from the bay and down the shore as far as Montrose. These pine lands when cleared produce well, and we saw many evidences of plenty and contentedness—perhaps a bit too much of the latter. The colored population in this region seems to be doing well. They are industrious, most of them owning their own little homes, and for the most part are living self-respecting and respectable lives. The climate here is semi-tropical. We saw gardens green to-day that were planted last autumn. Peach trees are in bloom. Roses bloom all through the year. The recent cold snap in the north was felt here in a temperature which registered thirty-two degrees, but it does not seem to have done any damage to speak of, while such occurrences are exceptional. Bro. H. E. McMillin and wife, prominent members of the Euclid Ave. Christian Church, Cleveland, O., have arrived and are guests at the same house which we have found so pleasant a home. But before this reaches the eyes of our readers we shall be somewhere in Florida if our plans do not miscarry.

We have been mingling a little light reading with our resting, and among other books we have at last read "David Harum." The source of its popularity is not far to seek. It strikes the average reader at his own level. It is not a book of high ideals. David Harum and John Lennox, though widely different, represent two types of men of the world who make no pretensions to living according to the highest pattern though not without admirable traits. The prevalence of champagne and wine among both the female and the male characters in the story, and that quite as a matter of course, gives the book low rank when measured by the highest ethical standard, though we doubt not it is a faithful enough portrayal of real types of character as they exist in Central New York and elsewhere. "Ramona," which we have also read for the first time, is a much stronger story and its aim and tone are higher. Mrs. Helen Hunt Jackson, its author, may have drawn the Indian character rather higher than the facts would justify in all cases, but she herself admits there are exceptions. We do not believe, however, she has drawn in too dark colors the mistreatment of the Indians by the white settlers and by the Indian agencies. "On the Suwannee River" and Robert Louis Stevenson's "Inland Voyage" are some of the other books which have helped us to rest while sojourning in these pine woods beside the bay.

Questions and Answers

What was the gift of the Holy Spirit which was promised on the day of Pentecost? J. W. Sconce.

We hesitate to attempt to state all that was involved in the gift of the Holy Spirit either to the disciples upon whom came the "cloven tongues like as of fire," or to those who received it later in accordance with the terms which Peter proclaimed, but the immediate and obvious results give us at least a starting-point for an answer. Before the day of Pentecost the disciples had been faithful in prayer and supplication (Acts 1:14) but inactive. The gift of the Holy Spirit meant first of all, just as Jesus had said it would (Acts 1:8), an impulse to bear witness. The result was that the disciples became from that hour a power in the world. The impulse to Christian activity is something which cannot be dissociated from the gift of the Holy Spirit. The group of believers in Jerusalem did not become a church until, moved by the Spirit, they began to act for the spread of the truth. In view of this, are we not justified in considering that any body of professed believers whose lack of activity as witnesses shows that the Spirit is not producing in them that first and most important result which it produced on Pentecost, has ceased to be a church in the truest sense, even though it may have a plurality of elders, each the husband of one wife, and all the other features of a complete and correct organization which the early church at Jerusalem did not have?

1. Do the words in the closing chapter of Revelation in regard to adding to and taking from "the book of this prophecy" refer to the entire Bible? How about Deut. 4:2 and Prov. 30:6?

2. I have heard it stated that the book of Esther and the story of Samson are religious fiction, inserted in the Bible because of the lessons they teach. Is not this teaching dangerous? A Subscriber.

1. "The book" referred to in Rev. 22: 18,19 certainly does not mean the Bible as a whole, which never constituted a single book until long after the days of John, and probably does not refer to the book of Revelation in its entirety, but to the substance of the prophecy contained in it. The words in verses 16-19 are put into the mouth of Jesus and the reference to the book can be more reasonably understood as applying to the substance of the revelation which had been given to John than to the literary record of it in the closing book of the New Testament. The passages in Deuteronomy and Proverbs certainly do not refer specifically to the whole Bible. The words in Deut. 4:2 are an injunction uttered by Moses in regard to a code which he was about to deliver to the children of Israel. The proverb mentioned refers to all divine commands whenever and wherever given.

2. There is, in our opinion, no adequate reason for doubting that the stories of Esther and Samson are historically true. Those who would deny the historicity of these accounts would probably interpret them as we do the parables, finding their value in the truth of the principles which they involve, while attaching no importance to the question as to whether or not the events described ever really happened. Whether historically true or not, the truths which they embody are doubtless the reason for their being in the Bible. It is unquestionably dangerous to fall into the habit of characterizing biblical narratives indiscriminately as fictitious. It is also dangerous to lose sight of the fact that the Old Testament narratives have a truth that is more vital than their historical truth.

When men are born, have they not within them the germs of a certain will power, of a sense of right and wrong, and of an intellect, together making heredity; and are these not developed and influenced by environment, over which the person has no control? If so, can a person ever act otherwise than he does act? R. G. B.

The reasoning which would destroy the freedom of the will by reducing human life to the resultant of two forces, heredity and environment, overlooks one factor which is stated in the question. The endowment of man with will power puts the initiative and referendum of every act in his own power. Man's power to perform certain acts is limited by inherited talent, training and environment, but no such limitation is imposed upon the will. Poverty, prison or disease may prevent action, but the pauper, the prisoner and the cripple are still free as regards the will. The strongest biblical argument against that form of fatalism which denies man's freedom is the assurance that "God created man in his own image." The image of God is not the image of an irresponsible slave to inheritance and circumstances.

It is claimed by some that washing the disciples' feet should be practiced as a church ordinance, just as the Lord's supper and baptism, and it is argued that in all three observances we have the example and precept of Jesus. Is this reasoning correct? Timothy.

There are many answers to be given to those who hold that feet washing is a church ordinance co-ordinate with baptism and the Lord's supper. If there were no others, this one would be a sufficient answer: that the apostles did not so understand the Master's wish. We read that they "continued in the breaking of bread" and that they enjoined and practiced baptism. But we nowhere read that they practiced foot-washing as an ordinance. The apostles, even if they had had no inspiration, had exceptional facilities for understanding the wishes of Jesus. They understood that he wished them to continue the practices of baptism and the Lord's supper and that he did not wish them to practice feet-washing as an ordinance.

I have heard it said that prayer is not accepted until one has believed, repented and been baptized. Is not prayer a part of repentance and are not our prayers heard when we desire to change our lives in obedience to the gospel? W. S. Austin.

There is no reason to believe that God ever refuses to hear a sincere and honest prayer. It is true, too, that an honest and sincere prayer is impossible to one who has not at least begun to believe and repent. Both are continuous processes rather than instantaneous acts. Any one who has enough faith and penitence to feel the need of prayer and see in it a source of help, has a right to pray.

At a church election a member of the board told the people they could vote, whether members of the congregation or not, and a secret ballot was cast. Is this method proper? A. B. C.

There is nothing necessarily improper about a secret ballot, but it seems obvious that only members of the congregation should vote in electing officers of the congregation. That is the common-sense rule of all organizations.

The Permanent Contribution of the XIXth Century to English Literature

By Prof. William Lyon Phelps

I. THE POETS*

There is only one period of English literature that can compare with the nineteenth century, and that is the Elizabethan. Dominated by the supreme literary genius of the world, glorified by an array of dramatists whose combined work outshines the Hellenic stage, the Elizabethan era may justly be called the greatest period of the greatest literature of the planet. But with the exception of the mighty names of Bacon and Spenser, the age of Elizabeth found its chief expression in the drama alone; while the age of Victoria bewilders the critic fully as much by the splendid variety of its literary production as by its extraordinary excellence. Poetry, fiction and criticism—in all these three great departments the century which has just closed can show masters.

Keats.

Before the nineteenth century was twenty-five years old, however, English literature suffered a terrible loss—a loss that as our perspective grows clearer, seems inexpressible. This was the premature death of John Keats. Dying at the age of twenty-five, before most men of genius have done mature work, Keats left behind him a small number of poems that have given him an undisputed place in the front rank of the English poets. Even as it is, his reputation is growing so rapidly that the critics of the year 2000 may place him as the first poet of the nineteenth century. He was born in the same year with Carlyle; had he lived one-half as long as the great Scotchman, he might have surpassed all other British poets except Shakspere. For he had the supreme gift of poetic expression; none of his followers or successors, not even his chief disciple, Tennyson, equaled him in this respect; "The Ode on a Grecian Urn," "The Ode to a Nightingale," "The Eve of St. Agnes," "Hyperion,"—these show a complete mastery of diction that no other English poets except Shakspere and Milton possessed. And the wonderful thing about the man is that he grew with such astonishing speed; nor was his growth unhealthy, tainted with the germs of disease, like his suffering frame. No one can read his letters and not see how steady and healthy was his intellectual advance; how clearly he recognized his own powers, and the proper way to use them; how noble was his ideal in poetry, and how gladly he would sacrifice everything in its pursuit. Who can tell what masterpieces this man would have produced had he lived to middle age? All we know is that they would have been masterpieces, and would in all probability have surpassed everything that is now included in his work.

> "Thou art gone from us; years go by and Spring
> Gladdens and the young earth is beautiful,
> Yet thy songs come not; other bards arise,
> But none like thee."

Wordsworth.

In addition to the name of Keats, the nineteenth century can show five other poets, who now seem to have a fixed place in the front rank. These are Wordsworth, Byron, Shelley, Tennyson, and Browning. The first and last of these were prophets as well as poets—each of the two had a right to the name Vates as well as Poeta. They wrote many beautiful poems, but in addition to their artistic creations, they bore a distinct message to humanity. It is unfortunately true to say, in estimating the value of Wordsworth's poetic production, that his reputation now rests on about one-third of it; the rest being mostly commonplace, and some of that deserving even a worse epithet. But at his best, Wordsworth appeals to thoughtful readers irresistibly, and is by many critics of to-day given the third place in English poetry, immediately after Milton. For he is our great spiritual interpreter of nature. In this field he has never had an equal in English literature, and but one successful rival in the world—his great contemporary, Goethe. His view of nature is of course a modern one, a view impossible to Shakspere and Milton, for the spirit of their times had not made such a mental attitude possible. Wordsworth regarded nature as in some mysterious way alive, spiritual and immaterial, and containing all the lessons that mankind needed to learn. The function of the poet is to discover what these truths are, and interpret them to his fellow-men. We need not seek here to analyze his teaching—it has been done by many a prose critic, notably Principal Shairp, and its essence has been poetically expressed in a final form by Matthew Arnold, and by William Watson, in his remarkable poem, "Wordsworth's Grave"—a poem worthy of the master it celebrates. Wordsworth learned from nature the lessons of peace and rest, and no century ever needed his teaching more than the turbulent nineteenth. In a striking passage in his autobiography, John Stuart Mill tells us how Wordsworth brought him from darkness to light, and no greater tribute to his power was ever paid than by this "logic-chopping engine."

Browning.

The last one of the giant race to make his appearance was Browning. This extraordinary man has a double claim on our attention. Of all English poets he is the most original. After his boyhood he never came under the influence of any of his predecessors or contemporaries, but struck out into entirely new paths, and finally forced an antagonistic public into a complete acknowledgment of his poetic gift. Besides his astonishing intellectual vigor and originality of expression, it is now generally agreed that in the width of his sympathies and in his analysis of all phases of human life and character, he has surpassed all other English poets except Shakspere. As a psychologist in verse he towers over all other writers of the nineteenth century. His message to us is manifold, but it is all summed up in the conclusion of his first poem, "Pauline"—

> "Sun-treader, I believe in God and truth
> And love."

He is an unflinching optimist, and his optimism is more encouraging and stimulating than Emerson's, because he sees and recognizes the dark side of life. What he taught in "Paracelsus" he maintained to the end—the necessity of imperfection, nay, the joy and glory of it. For imperfection is necessarily associated with progress and development, and the soul's obstacles are but the means toward its attainment of ultimate perfection. His treatment of religious doubt, for example, which casts such a shadow over the writings of his contemporaries, is a case in point. Were there no doubt, were the future life secure, there could be no real virtue. Virtue lies in the struggle, not in calm, unquestioning acquiescence.

> "I count life just a stuff
> To try the soul's strength on, educe the man."

Everything in life can be made serviceable to the strong man, the man of faith and high ideals. Perhaps the extent to which his optimism carried him is shown best by his use of figures. He loves to take a pessimistic proverb, like "No rose without its thorn," and make it a source of comfort. In the speech of the Pope in "The Ring and the Book," a speech that indicates the high-water mark of nineteenth century poetry, we find this passage, which it is safe to say no one but Browning could have written:

> "So a thorn
> Comes to the aid of and completes the rose—
> Courage to-wit, no woman's gift nor priest's."

Of all the great thought-leaders of the century, none is more thrilling, more stimulating, and more encouraging in the call to manhood.

Byron and Shelley.

Few literary men have had a greater intellectual endowment than Lord Byron. His genius has never been seriously doubted, and in fields of expression so far apart as song and satire, he ranks with the great masters. His keen wit and his lyrical gift were alike remarkable. But although he once had a European reputation and influence such as few British writers have enjoyed, and although every lover of poetry comes at times under the spell of his melody, his work has one fatal taint—insincerity. The world did not need Byron's example to show that one may be at the same time a great poet and yet lack the qualities of good citizenship. But the lack of moral force is apt to prevent a man from realizing his highest possibilities as an artist. That Byron did at times first-class work, that he must be ranked as a first-class poet, all unprejudiced critics will agree; but if he had maintained an attitude toward his art like that of Tennyson, if in short he had acted like a responsible person, there would have been much less chaff in his works, and his influence would have been mightier and more permanent. He chose, however, to write, not like a poet, but "like a gentleman"; with him poetry was not a sacred calling, it was an accomplishment. His work accordingly suffers. There is always the doubt of his sincerity: there is in his finest frenzies something of the poseur.

Although Shelley died before he was thirty, he apparently reached his full development. His death was a great loss to English literature, but not nearly so severe as that of Keats. It is doubtful if Shelley would have done anything better than his previous performances, which to be sure were splendid enough to make his position in English poetry unassailable. As a lyrist and song-writer he is second only to Shakspere. His lyrics are ideals of what a true lyric should be, and though, like Keats and Tennyson, he made no important contribution to the thought of the age, he left behind him a priceless legacy of beautiful poems. His reputation has increased rather than diminished with time.

Tennyson.

The most representative poet of the nineteenth century, the real Laureate in fact as well as in name, is of course Alfred, Lord Tennyson. Living as he did in every decade of the century, his is its clearest singing voice, and he is the most faithful mirror of its ideas. Tennyson was an all-around poet, succeeding in every department of poetry except the drama. There his lack of originality and of passion caused him to make almost a complete failure. For Tennyson was not an original man; his mind, as reflected in his verse and in the Memoir by his son, was distinctly commonplace. Like many writers, he stated problems rather than solved them. But one of the truest functions of the poet is to represent clearly, to be the mouthpiece of his age; and no one ever lived more fully up to this ideal than Tennyson. All the philosophical, religious, scientific and political thought of the nineteenth century may be found in his works, usually expressed in almost perfect forms of verse. For he was a consummate artist. As some one has said, he was an artist before he was a poet. In epical, descriptive, narrative, lyrical poetry he was generally regarded as the foremost man of his time. Historically, he is the child of Keats, and while perhaps he never wrote any one poem so perfect as the best things in his master, he wrote so immense an amount of admirable poetry that he exercised in his day an enormous influence, not merely over hundreds of thousands of readers, but over all contemporary poets except Browning. And the loyal friendship of these two men is one of the most beautiful things in the annals of literature, as beautiful as the nobleness and purity of their lives.

Besides the poets of the first rank enumerated above, a considerable number of English writers have made permanent additions to poetical literature. Perhaps Coleridge and Mrs. Browning ought to be ranked in the first class; if that be so, the latter is the only woman who has ever possessed the smallest claim to so exalted a position. In view of the prodigious number of women who read and understand poetry, such a fact is singular. Other poets of the century whose work will endure are Rossetti, Matthew Arnold, Scott, and possibly Swinburne. Clough and Landor wrote some poems that will never be forgotten, and many writers have produced a few things that the world will not willingly let die. As for Kipling and Stephen Phillips, we are too close to them to rate them judiciously. Let us hope that they will ultimately belong to the twentieth century rather than to the nineteenth.

A Sonnet.

By Gordon Garrett.

It is not parting from the friend I love
That makes me sad; for friendship, swift as light
And strong as armed hosts girded with might,
Can scorn the leagues and rocky barriers move.
It is not absence through the lapse of years
From one held dear that grieves the loving heart,
For time is naught, and faithful memory's part
To bridge that gulf which but the fickle fears.
But when I sit beside a trusted friend
And press the hand and gaze into the eye
And speak the words of friendship of strong men,
But find no answering pressure of the hand,
No brightening glance, no word to match my cry,
But dumb indifference—'tis then! 'tis then!

God Rest Our Queen!

England mourns her irreparable loss. Only one woman in all history has earned the title of Great. Catherine the Great, of Russia, could never be called the Good. Victoria the Good was also Victoria the Great. She has shone in the three ideals of womanhood. Victoria was an ideal wife, an ideal mother, an ideal queen. Hers is the longest actual reign in the history of mankind. One reign only nominally exceeded it. Louis XIV of France reigned seventy years, but he was only a little child when he ascended the throne and could for years only reign through his council. Queen Victoria was a young woman when she was crowned and she was young at heart when she passed away. Her sad obsequies are in preparation as I write, and this week is to end with a Saturday of mourning and memorial while her remains are being taken for sepulture in that magnificent mausoleum at Frogmore, near Windsor, which she erected as the tomb of Albert the Good.

Godliness and Government.

One thing above all Victoria has accomplished. She has forever demonstrated to the world in an age of hard materialism that no human polity can flourish without God in it; but that almost any kind of government may be successful in promoting the welfare of humanity if God is allowed to be supreme. Here we have in Europe a bewildering variety of governments. Some are pure despotisms. Some are gigantic military autocracies. Some are imperialisms modified by elementary constitutionalism. Some are truly, really and genuinely constitutional monarchies. Some are republican and democratic. All differ. But only one has been a happy success for the millions of the people. Britain alone has been stable, contented and prosperous. In Germany, France, Russia, Italy, Spain, the masses are miserable. Militarism is crushing the life out of every continental population and republican France is even more burdened than autocratic Germany. The truth is that godliness still affects the great heart of England, while it has become a half-effete force in the whole of Europe, with the single exception of Russia, where the masses of the people are profoundly religious, notwithstanding the dominance of gross and blind superstition. Queen Victoria elevated Christianity to a pedestal of popular supremacy which it has never occupied before in the history of any nation, excepting only in the wonderful Puritan age. The fact is that our grand old Queen was a Puritan at heart. She was a sound Protestant, a friend of the Reformation and a sincere Evangelical. At her elbow in her own private room were always to be seen a Bible, a prayer book and a hymn book. She loved to read the exquisite sermons of Frederick William Robertson, of Brighton. Those are the most beautiful sermons ever printed in the English language, as I think will be allowed by any of my American friends who are acquainted with them. Queen Victoria loved reading sermons. And she loved listening to good preaching.

The Queen's Favorite Preachers.

One of the very first printed sermons which ever made a real impression on me as a boy was a discourse which was published by the order of the Queen. It was preached before Her Majesty at Balmoral in Scotland by Dr. Norman McLeod, a Presbyterian of the Scotch Church. The topic was "Religion in Common Things." Again, the Queen took a great liking for the preaching of Principal Tulloch, of Aberdeen University, and as long as he lived he was seen at the Court on all great occasions. I personally well knew one of Her Majesty's favorite English clergymen. Dr. Connor, the dean of Windsor, whose early death was so much lamented, was the eloquent and beloved vicar of the lovely parish of Newport, Isle of Wight, during the four years while I lived and preached and worked as the Baptist minister in that town. I greatly admired Dr. Connor and retain a sweet memory of his beautiful life and character. The Queen last of all made the Bishop of Winchester, Dr. Randall Davidson, her chief spiritual confidant and adviser. But all her life she was much more a Presbyterian than an Anglican. She loved simplicity and was a simple, earnest, sincere Christian soul. History will never lay to her charge any attempt to favor this wretched revival of romanizing ritualism.

A Strange Religious Muddle.

What a singular anomaly is modern Christianity. It is a most blessed consolation that Christ is infinitely greater than Christianity. Look for instance at the strange kind of Christianity which Queen Victoria was compelled to profess. In England she was by law compelled to be a member of the Established Church of England and Wales. That is an Episcopal and very priestly Church. But the Queen lived much of her time every year in Scotland, which she learned early in her reign passionately to love. Directly she crossed the Tweed from England into Scotland, she was compelled to be a member of the Scottish Church as established by law. But that is a non-Episcopal Church, devoid of priestcraft and purely Presbyterian instead of prelatical and sacerdotal. No two Churches could be more extremely different. Yet the Queen of England was obliged to profess allegiance on oath to each! And when Edward VII, our new King, is crowned, he also will have to be by turns of two different sects, each claiming to be the true type of Christianity. It cannot be considered wonderful that large numbers of English people are longing for the overthrow of that system of Erastianism, the State Church, which still deforms our British Christianity.

The Little Royal Palaces.

Queen Victoria endeared herself to the nation by her loving and sweet simplicity. She loved the poor. She was fond of birds, pet animals, flowers, music and children. Her great delight was to go about her estates calling on the poor old cottagers, with whom she would sit and chat for hours, entering into all their simple and humble lives with real sympathy. She did not like her vast stately palaces of Windsor and London, and at the first opportunity always hastened away to her little villas at Osborne in the Isle of Wight and Balmoral in the Highlands of Scotland. That Scotch paradise especially was her beloved abode. It is a small house, with small rooms, small furniture. Here when she was a young Queen she used to romp in the nursery with her young children. She was a merry-hearted girl. No mistake is greater than to suppose that the Queen of England was of sombre and gloomy temperament. She was naturally of the opposite extreme, filling her Highland home with laughter and music, and being in her youth fond even of dancing. It was when the dark cloud of her great bereavement shadowed her life that she passed for a considerable period into comparative seclusion. "Albert the Good," who, as Tennyson wrote in his beautiful ode, "wore the pure white flower of a blameless life," was suddenly snatched away, dying in that same home at Osborne where the Queen herself has passed away. For forty years the Queen has been widowed, meeting in that time a succession of other bitter bereavements which she sustained with the noblest fortitude. Two of her sons died before her and one of her daughters, and two of her daughters are widows. One of her grandsons, Prince Victor Christian, has fallen in battle in South Africa, and another, the Duke of Clarence, who was abruptly snatched away by influenza, would one day have been King of England.

My Visit to our Western Churches.

In the beautiful west of England we have only two churches. To these I have just paid a brief visit. In Gloucester I have had the pleasure of once more preaching anniversary sermons and lecturing. I have several times in these letters alluded to E. H. Spring, the indefatigable pastor of the church which is steadily becoming one of our strongest communions in England. Bro. Spring is a living example of the advantage of a protracted pastorate. He believes in a long ministry and so do I. I addressed large audiences at Gloucester with much enjoyment to myself. Bro. Spring will be remembered by readers who were present at the great Cincinnati Jubilee Convention in 1899. He is an all-round reformer and is developing church life along a line of great novelty and strength, for he indoctrinates his people with ideas about the Gospel of Health, teaching them to cultivate "plain living and high thinking." The results are beautiful. Here we have a people who are ready for any kind of self-denial. The Cheltenham church is not so strong. It has had to endure greater trials and difficulties of late. Our Bro. T. Herbert Bates, formerly of New Zealand and Australia, is pastor in Cheltenham. Cheltenham is a most lovely health resort. Here we should hope to have also a strong church in time. Bro. Bates, like Bro. Spring, has about him a beautiful family. Each of these ministers is helped by a gracious and devoted Christian wife and each of these churches has the advantage of a bright and useful pastor's family. That is to my mind the very finest influence which can be brought to bear on any church. When our movement extends rapidly, as some day it must, it will spread most quickly in the west of England. At present our stronghold is in the northwest, in the towns of Chester, Liverpool, Southport, Lancaster, Saltney, Ingleton, Birkenhead, but in the great southwest we are unrepresented, although there are waiting for us Bristol, Cardiff, Swansea, Exeter, Plymouth, Devonport, Falmouth. In the south we might start work in Portsmouth or Brighton, and in the heart of England we look with longing eyes on such fields as Birmingham, Leicester, Nottingham and Wolverhampton. We have not any congregations in the north, though we might hope for great success in York, Leeds, Manchester, Hull, or Newcastle; while all Scotland awaits us, as does all Wales and so does all Ireland. Chicago Letter.

By George A. Campbell.

The long controversy between the contractors and labor unions has been at last amicably settled. The labor unions demanded recognition of their societies on the part of the contractors, a half-holiday every Saturday and a uniform day's work. So fiercely did the controversy rage all last year that many of the largest contractors refused to put up any buildings in Chicago, and those that did were compelled to work under police protection. Thus the building enterprise has been paralyzed here for some time. The trouble, however, is now settled, to the joy of all, and somewhat to the advantage of the laborers. The extent of building operations in Chicago this year promises to be unparalleled. One man alone is erecting 500 high-class houses near the home of the writer, and this is but an indication of what the entire city is planning to do this summer.

The mayoralty election promises to be exciting and exceedingly important. Mayor Carter Harrison will certainly be the Democratic candidate. It will be hard to defeat him. His stand against the encroachments of the street railway corporation on the rights of the city has deservedly made him popular with those who believe in city control of its natural monopolies. It seems to be his policy, too, to give as "wide open" a city as the political hangers-on want; but it is just for this reason that the more respectable citizens are anxious for his defeat. A petition with 70,000 signatures of voters has been presented to John M. Harlan, asking him to allow his name to be placed in nomination as the Republican candidate. He has consented. Four years ago he polled a very large vote as an independent. If he secures the nomination, which he undoubtedly will, and if he gains the election, which is equally sure, Chicago will have a most worthy mayor.

Quite a good deal of interest is manifested by Chicagoans in the action of the state legislature in appointing a committee to investigate the financial standing of Zion Bank. Mr. Dowie's business transactions are assuming large proportions, and the friends of his followers, who are freely trusting him with their hard-earned savings, are very anxious to know if he is conducting his financial institution in a business-like way.

The Union Church is rejoicing in installing, by various meetings, their new pastor, Roland A. Nichols. The first week after his arrival was one of festivities, the second one of planning, and the third one of action. Bro. Nichols has begun a meeting which will continue for at least a month. Before this meeting was begun a house to house canvass was made of the immediate community. Bro. Nichols has made a very favorable impression on Chicago Disciples.

Wallace W. Payne has resigned the pastorate of the Evanston Church to take the chair of Biblical Instruction established by the C. W. B. M. at Lawrence, Kan. While in Chicago, Bro. Payne has been pursuing special courses in the University of Chicago, preparing himself for such work. He leaves the young church in splendid condition. Bro. Payne's leaving makes the third pastorless church in Chicago, the other two are the First and Irving Park.

W. B. Taylor is holding a meeting at Keeley Street Mission. This mission is chiefly Presbyterian in its membership; but has been supplied by some of our brethren from the university for two or three years. Two new missions have been opened since the first of the year; one under the direction of Monroe Street, at 44th and Van Buren, and the other under the direction of the Austin Church, at 48th and Kenzie. The Monroe Street Church is arranging to complete their building this spring. The cost will be about $1,500. The Humboldt Park Church has purchased a church building from the Presbyterians. The meetings held in the various missions by visiting brethren, although not resulting in many additions, are reported by the pastors to have interested many people not before known to the missions.

The foreign missionary rally was held at the Grand Pacific lecture room Feb. 18. Brethren Ames, Allen, Tinsley, Taylor, Campbell, Nichols, of the local pastors, made addresses. The feature, however, of greatest interest was the addresses of H. H. Guy and F. E. Meigs. Their addresses were of a high order; but perhaps the most profitable was the conference they held, answering the many questions asked them by the audience. It is hoped that our twenty-two Chicago churches will take the offering next Sunday.

Religion and Intellect

By CHARLES F. THWING

President of the Western Reserve University

The first thing to be said is that the church has intellectual relations. For some might, in thoughtlessness, be inclined to affirm that the church has relations to the heart and to the will of man, but not to his intellect. The simple truth is that the church cannot avoid holding intellectual relations, even if it would avoid them, and, further, the church would not avoid holding them even if it could. For the church stands for the truth; and is not the intellect the organ and agent of the truth, and is not truth a function of the intellect? The church stands not only for truth, but also for truths, for facts and inferences held in proper and just proportion: what organ determines what proportions are proper and just if not the intellect? The church represents history: does not the intellect weigh and assess and judge the elements which constitute the evolution of the divine will in human affairs? The church is founded on a revelation, and through revelation its life is nourished, its energies strengthened, its progress insured: is it not the intellect which discriminates between the false and the real in any presumed revelation, and which detects the spurious in any unworthy endeavor to minister to the life of the church?

The plain truth is that every member of the church is in essence a rationalist. He can be no other. He may call himself something else, he may spurn the name, but he is obliged to trust in his reason. He must trust in his reason even to declare he does not trust in it. Let the most devoted and devout adherent of the church affirm that the church can do no wrong, that her ministers can hold no error, and her creed contain no heresy. Why does he thus believe and affirm? Because he believes that it is more reasonable to hold that the church can do no wrong, the minister entertain no error, and the creed contain no heresy, than to believe otherwise. Why does one accept the Bible as of divine inspiration and authority? Because this belief seems to be more in accordance with the facts of the Scriptures and of life. Who interprets these facts? The intellect. Who determines the conclusions which these facts teach? The intellect. Why does the Protestant believe as he believes? Why does the Romanist believe as he believes? Because to each his belief seems the more reasonable. To the Protestant it seems more reasonable to let reason have pretty full play; to the Romanist it seems more reasonable to submit the individual reason to the reason of the church universal and Catholic.

Therefore all condemnation of the church for its rationalism is misdirected. Man cannot be too rational. He cannot know truth too largely or too accurately. He cannot reason with a profoundness too deep, or an exactness too fine, or a comprehensiveness too large. What we need fear is too little reason, not too much. Partial knowledge, not comprehensive, foolish methods of inquiry, not wise, are to be dreaded. The peril is not that we shall think God's thoughts after him in either philosophy, science or theology, but that we shall think thoughts which are not true, and by methods which are not sound.

The intellectual relations of the church in the twentieth century touch two or three institutions or movements of the church. One of these relations concerns the pulpit. The pulpit demands, creates, necessitates the intellect. You cannot have a pulpit without a preacher, and you cannot have a preacher without a mind. The pulpit represents the intellectual relations of the church in their finest flower and richest fruitage. The pulpit naturally creates a great intellect. For the themes of the pulpit are great themes. God, eternity, goodness, justice, man mortal, immortal, man sinful and man holy—the greatest themes on which the reason of man can reflect are the themes of the pulpit. Their truth or their falseness determines human destiny. These themes are a rich historic heritage. They are as old as the human race. They have been wrought over and over and over again by the great preachers and poets and essayists. All history furnishes illustrations of their worth. Though as old as the race, these themes are also as fresh as the passions of the throbbing heart, as personal as remorse, and as immediate as the demand of the awakened conscience for forgiveness.

The pulpit is a throne of intellectual power. There can be no permanent decline of the intellectual relations of the church so long as the heart of the preacher is warm, and so long as his mind is great. Any decline in the power of the pulpit will show itself at once in the choice of themes which are not religious, or which, even if religious, do not touch the centre and the source of religion. So long as the pulpit will select great themes, and will consider these themes in great ways, so long will the intellectual relations of the church in a most significant form be noble.

The peril is, and it is immediate, that great themes will not be selected, or, if selected, will not be adequately discussed. Preaching is in instant peril of being simply descriptive. Some one tells of the great Agassiz remarking upon a book by a scientist to the effect that it was not compositive but only descriptive. Too much preaching is of this character: it describes in poetical phrase and figurative speech the phenomena of human life; it does not interpret these phenomena. Too much preaching deals with the outside of life; it is objective, exterior; too little of it deals with the inside of life, the character, the subjective, the interior. This is not the preaching which makes the strongest appeal to the strongest intellect; it is preaching which makes its strongest appeal to the mere superficial elements of mind and of character.

But the intellectual relations of the church are evidenced in the aggressive administration of the church as well as in its pulpit. The time has now come for the mightiest intellectual forces of Christendom to unite in an endeavor for the world's betterment. The efforts of the past have too often been single and sporadic. They have been like the attempt to kill out the Russian thistle of the plain with the boy's jack-knife, or to level the mountain by a bunch of fire-crackers. An endeavor great in the continuing of all civil forces, great in the summing of the noblest consecration of human hearts and wills, and also great in the mobilizing of the highest intellectual powers of the race, should be made for the transmuting of barbarism into finest Christian civilization. The endeavors which in commerce and manufacturing are creating the enormous accumulations of capital and of working forces should find parallels in the Christian services. The immense massing of the Christian forces and the direction of them, under wise leadership, should make a world in which the Son of God would be recognized as the King of men.

In filling the intellectual demands of the pulpit and of ecclesiastical administration, the church is to equip herself with noble schools for the training of ministers. The improvement of theological education has not kept pace with the improvement of medical or of legal education. When the last century opened theological education was the first to heed the demand for a better professional training; medical education followed, though at a long distance. But as the twentieth century opens, both medical and legal education, relatively to what were their respective conditions twenty-five years ago, are far superior to theological education. Theological education has advanced, but its advancement has been slow in comparison with the swift progress of the training of the physician and of the lawyer. Theological education is in peril of being narrow without being profound, and of being thin without being broad. The removal of the peril of the thin and narrow education of the clergymen is best accomplished by the putting of great men and great theologians in the schools of divinity. Great teachers create great students, and great students create great ministers.

The intellectual relations of the church in the twentieth century, therefore, demand the masterful equipping of theological schools. These schools, thus equipped, will train great ministers, who shall be both great preachers and great ecclesiastical administrators. The present seems to be ebb-tide in the affairs of the church. It is only a temporary declension. And one method of restoring the church to its full and proper place in the life of the community is to increase and to enlarge the function of the intellect.

Garden of Gethsemane.

By Walter S. Smith.

[An Acrostic. Read the initials downward.]

Garden of the olive press
All in somber midnight dress,
Resting near its entrance gate
Do the Lord's disciples wait.
Even now they hear His prayer,
Now He waiteth in despair;

"Oh! this cruel, bitter hour!
Father, Father! Lend Thy power!

God, my Father, must it be
Evil thus must burden me?
Thou art wise! Thou knowest best,
Hear, if may be, my request.
Surely some less poignant plan
Even yet may rescue man!
Mine, however, let it be Always to submit to Thee.
Not as I would, Holy One!
Ever let Thy will be done!"

Nelson A. McConnell.

By J. M. Rudy.

The Man.

It has been my good fortune to be intimately associated with the late Nelson A. McConnell for more than two years. I say good fortune, for I feel that there can come to the young preacher few blessings richer than close association with those who have been "long in the King's country and oft have looked into His face." We have walked and talked together. He was often at my home. We loved to have him sit at the table with us. He seemed to bring something very wholesome into our home. Nelson A. McConnell was a very manly man. His was not the religion of sentiment. His faith had deep roots. He did not feel that God was under any special obligation to him. He therefore tried in a most humble but manly way to conform his life to God's law. He felt that God's work for man was perfect and it remains for man to make his work for God as perfect as possible. He never became possessed of the feeling that God needed the advice of any man, but always felt that man stood in the most absolute need of God's word and God's wisdom. Some thought Nelson A. McConnell a little gruff and severe. Often he did "answer a fool according to his folly." An irreverent man could not feel easy under his piercing eye. True, he seemed at times a little severe, but when the shell was broken the kernel within was rich, sweet and tender. He had a strong hold on the eternal. He was deeply reverent. He had the least of the empty and frivolous in his life of any one I have ever known.

The Preacher.

Nelson A. McConnell was a strong preacher of the word. He knew the Book as few know it. He believed those who know the Book best are least inclined to reject its teachings. In his preaching he was logical and precise. While listening to Bro. McConnell in one of our district conventions I called the attention of several of our preaching brethren to one characteristic of his preaching: "He never uses a single superfluous word." After he finished his talk I said, "Did he use one word that he could as well leave out?" "We did not hear one" was the reply. His prayers were always models. In the home where death had come he was the strong man and blessed comforter. It was not so much what he said in the sick room as what he was. He was always greater than his words. He was a great teacher in the home. At the fireside in his younger days he would explain large portions of God's word. One fact ought to impress us all. Of all who were converted under his preaching very few fell away. They were not simply numerical additions to the church, his were converts. They became stalwart Christians. They were able "to give a reason for the hope that was in them."

Bro. McConnell felt himself called upon to defend the Bible. He had a more exalted conception of the ministry than many have. To him it was not a matter of keeping a job, but rather a matter of keeping the people purified by the fire of truth. He accepted the responsibility of the ministry from a source higher than human and felt, "woe is me if I preach not the gospel." Any reflection upon what he conceived as an inspired doctrine or a divine institution found in him scant sympathy.

James A. Garfield preached on Saturday evening before his nomination for Congress on the following Tuesday. It was before Bro. McConnell had left Ohio. All were proud of the rising preacher and politician; but there was one man with a heavy heart who listened to Garfield on that Saturday evening. He felt that Garfield was about to exchange the higher for the lower calling. This man with the heavy heart was Nelson A. McConnell. After a grand sermon and Garfield's friends were gathering around to offer words of cheer and extend hearty congratulations, this man with the heavy heart came to Garfield and putting his hand on Garfield's shoulder said: "Bro. Garfield, you are entering politics, be careful." The rather short reply came: "I guess I can look after myself." "No you can't," said Bro. McConnell, "'wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth,'" etc. Bro. McConnell left his young, ambitious friend and brother to fill out and apply the Scripture. "When the news flashed over this country and throughout the world that our beloved Garfield was struck down by the assassin's bullet I wept, and thought of the words: 'I guess I can look after myself.'" This touching and profoundly significant incident I received from the lips of Bro. McConnell.

Nelson A. McConnell never cast a vote. Jesus said, "Swear not at all." This settled the question for this godly man. He would not hold up his hand and be sworn.

Others know more about his early work in Iowa than does the present writer; let them write of this. "No map showing the growth of the Christian Church in Iowa would be complete without the name of Nelson A. McConnell written across it," said one well acquainted with his work.

His Last Night on Earth.

On Tuesday evening, Feb. 5, he returned to Cedar Rapids. He made his home with his daughter, Mrs. H. F. White, who has watched over and looked after her dear father with the strong affection and tender sympathy of a Christian daughter. On his way from the depot he stopped at the First Christian Church. This was the last time his beloved brethren and sisters saw him on earth. More than twenty years ago he had organized this church. It has been one of his dearest children. The writer therefore preached the last sermon to which our departed hero ever listened. It was from the words: "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world." This was one of his own favorite themes. The service that evening closed with a season of earnest prayer in which all were requested to join. Dear Bro. McConnell stepped out from his seat into the center isle, lifted his hands in the attitude of prayer, but that prayer was heard by none but God, a mute, tender prophecy it was that the time was at hand when the Father would relieve His faithful child of ever again performing the public duty of prayer. Someone else prayed, the leader closed the prayer service and he whose life was greater than his speech and whose works are his mightiest monument passed out of the Lord's house never to return alive. When another day broke he was fast journeying from the sleep of the flesh to the rest of the spirit.

What was most precious to his heart in these closing months of his earthly journey? This: "We know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. In this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven." There were two prayers that he often made touching the interests of our people in this city where he held his membership at his death. One was that there might be a second Christian church in this city. The second prayer was that there might be perfect harmony in the First Church. The first of these prayers was answered on the 9th of last October when God gave him the joy of constituting the Second Christian Church at the corner of Third Avenue and 6th Street, West Cedar Rapids. The other prayer, the brethren whom he loved and who loved him are sure cannot be an unanswered one. Peace to our well beloved.

Earth's Unrewarded Worthies.

By James Small.

"Full many a gem of purest ray serene," says the poet, "the deep, unfathomed caves of ocean bear, full many a flower is born to blush unseen and waste its sweetness on the desert air." In harmony with this, well has another said: "Little men do work for which great men get credit. Unseen men, unknown men, lay foundations upon which others erect monuments and establish their own fame."

The nurse instructing a little child, the mother forming the mind of her offspring, the teacher communicating the first elements of truth or the first principles of righteousness, these are the persons who if they do their work well insure the purity of the family, the prosperity of the community, the security of the state, and the blessing of God upon the generation to come. Oh lowly, lonely worker, toil on. Let your little work for God be done faithfully, and done well. Others may take the credit of the work which you have wrought and boast of great results and great success, but God knows the beginning and the end of our labors and the day is coming when he shall bring to light all hidden things and give to every man according as his work shall be. What revelations shall then astonish the beholders, when great things shall be made small and little things shall shine forth in grandeur, when many that are now first shall be last, and many who are now last shall be first.

Kansas City Letter.

By George H. Combs.

The churches by the Kaw begin the new year with confidence and high hopes. A. W. Kokendoffer, whose loss we could ill afford, has concluded to remain with the Forrest Ave. Church, to its great joy.

City missions are well to the front and our superintendent and evangelist, F. S. Bowen, reports 31 accessions for the month of January. W. F. Richardson is preaching monthly temperance sermons. The Sunday-school of the West Side Church averages in its collections nearly ten dollars per Sunday. As this is neither a large nor rich school the average is remarkable. O. P. Shrout is himself again after several weeks of semi-invalidism, and the work at the South Prospect Church moves on encouragingly. An organization of the young men of all our churches was formed last week, having as its aim the enlistment of Christian young men in active evangelistic work. Fuller reports soon as to its organization and its methods. The Sixth and Prospect Church contributes its quota of news; the reports of last year's work as follows: Added 305 (200 of these in the great Scoville meeting), net gain 239. Raised through all departments of the church $10,000. Of this something over $2,000 for missions. Present membership, 1,172.

The writer is in the midst of a series of Sunday evening sermons entitled "Some Twentieth Century Problems." Among the subjects discussed are "The Problem of Democracy," "The Problem of the City," "The Problem of Politics," "The Drink Problem," "The Labor Problem," etc.

The following clipping from one of our city papers shows how we are trying to solve the problem of reaching young men:

> The young men of the Sixth Street and Prospect Avenue Christian Church held a banquet in the Midland hotel last night and at the close of the reponses to toasts a permanent organization, of a social and fraternal nature, was perfected by electing the following officers: President, Bryson Jones; vice-president, D. P. Gribben; secretary, M. D. Stevenson; treasurer, W. T. Duncan.
> There were eighty-one present, all young men. The menu was an excellent one. Bryson Jones was the toastmaster. Attorney E. L. Massey spoke on the subject, "Business and the Intellectual Life;" Attorney J. A. Gordon responded on "Pro Bono Publico;" Edmond Morris discussed "Opportunity," and D. P. Gribben, in the absence of Clarence Spellman, spoke on "The Wagon and the Star."
> The Rev. Dr. George H. Combs, pastor of the church, stated the object of the organization, and the election of officers followed. The club will hold a banquet every two months, with business meetings in between. The membership is not limited to members of that congregation.

We have now reached the crisis-hour. The day for our offering for Foreign Missions is here. What have we done? What will we do? The question is more momentous than ever before. The world's eyes are upon the churches. The world is waiting to know whether in view of the recent developments in the Orient the churches will go forward or backward. What about China?

This is sure: any falling off in receipts will be interpreted by the critics of the Church as a weakening in evangelistic effort. To fail ever is hurtful, to fail now is disaster. We must go on. Whatever was done last year, we should improve upon it now. The church has been challenged. How then shall we act? Retreat? Never! We must plant our colors the further in the hostile field and bring up the army to the colors. Palsied be he who cries, "Retreat."

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

The Denver papers speak of our recently deceased brother, John C. Sutton, as "the Hermit of the Belfry." The reason for this is the fact that when "Uncle John" gave all that he had, about $30,000, toward the erection of the South Broadway Christian Church he requested that he might be permitted to occupy a room in the tower of the building. His request was granted. The room was well situated and well furnished. There was nothing in the life of "Uncle John," as his friends affectionately called him, to even suggest the use of the word "Hermit" when speaking of him. He was a little "peculiar"; but who is not? He desired to live in the house of worship in the erection of which he had taken so deep a practical interest. His wife had gone before to the spirit world. It was a cherished desire of Sister Sutton that a Christian church should be erected in South Denver. Out of regard for her memory her husband gave $30,000 of the $60,000 needed in the building of the South Broadway Church. So far as I know, "Uncle John" had no near relatives living. Why should he not live in a comfortable and well-furnished room in the church building if he desired to do so? I have said that Bro. Sutton was "peculiar," and this is true. Did you ever know a man to give his entire fortune to secure a house of worship for the Church in whose faith and fellowship he lived? This was a little "peculiar"—wasn't it? "Uncle John" said that he would rather be a doorkeeper in the house of the Lord than to dwell in the tents of wickedness. He was therefore made—not janitor, not sexton, but—"care taker" of the South Broadway Christian Church. Others did the work of cleaning, etc., etc. When you visit this city next summer take the "seeing Denver car" and note what the guide will say about this church and the "Hermit of the Belfry" when Ellsworth Street is reached on the run out South Broadway. "Uncle John" was one of the elders of our church. The people loved him with a tender and sincere affection. The infirmities of age caused him to abandon his room in the tower; but he had another, just as comfortable, in another part of the building, and I never entered this room but that I found persons present doing what they could to cheer the old man and make him comfortable. A few days before his decease Bro. and Sister W. H. Keer took him to their home and cared for him as if he had been their father. There was not a man, woman or child of the four hundred members of the South Broadway Christian Church who would not gladly have divided their last piece of bread with "Uncle John."

This much is said because the writers of fiction for the columns of the daily papers have grossly misrepresented, in the past, the treatment that "Uncle John" received at the hands of those whom his liberality had so greatly blessed. I speak of what I know.

John C. Sutton was born in 1823, on a farm in Butler county, Pa. The first twelve years of his life were spent on this farm. After leaving the farm he worked on a canal. It was while thus employed that he met James A. Garfield. He was doing the same kind of work—driving on the canal. "Jim and I used to be together a good deal and managed to make the time pass pretty rapidly," said "Uncle John" one day. By and by he became tired of walking up and down the canal. His next employment was in a rolling mill in Pittsburg. After two years of this character of work he found employment on a flatboat on the Ohio river. He was fond of machinery and learned to drive an engine. From working on a flatboat he drifted into stage-driving. He used to tell that he drove the first four-horse stage that ever entered Pittsburg. But this kind of work did not last long. Before many months he was fireman on a railroad engine. He soon learned to manage the machine and spent fourteen years running engines on various roads in Pennsylvania, New York and Ohio. During this period of his life he had some blood-curdling experiences and hair-breadth escapes. He was so disabled by an accident when drawing a fast train on the New York Central road that he was compelled to abandon this kind of life. At Alliance, Ohio, he opened a bakery and confectionery store. He remained in this business seventeen years and made money. In 1882 he came to Colorado. He was troubled with asthma and could find relief in no other place. After his removal to Colorado he settled in Custer county and went into mining. In this business he was so successful that in a comparatively short time he considered himself worth $100,000. But he was not satisfied. Who is? He invested and invested again until his $100,000 became $30,000. In 1891 he gave this to aid in the erection of the splendid stone edifice known as the South Broadway Christian Church. This was his best investment. What John C. Sutton gave he saved. It was by giving away all that he had that he laid up treasure for his last days on earth. What he gave he contributed of his own accord. No one solicited him. He sought out W. B. Craig, at that time in Denver, and told him what he had decided to do. He gave in such a quiet way that the people did not know he was left penniless until the work had so far progressed that it could not be stopped. To a reporter "Uncle John" said some time ago:

"The church has always been very good to me. The brethren even offered to support me without my doing any work, but to this I could not consent. I am happy here."

Is there a lesson in this story for those of us who remain? If it was well for this plain, honest man to give after this fashion, can it be ill for you, for me, to contribute in the same way? All that we have really belongs to God. Do you believe this? "The earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof." This is a quotation from the ancient Hebrew hymn book. What do we think of the statement? Does it affirm the truth? It seems to me that Christians are beginning to learn the lesson so clearly taught in our Bible—Old Testament and New—that they belong wholly to the Lord. When even the alphabet of this lesson is learned, out of our abounding wealth there will be enough and to spare in carrying forward the work that has been committed to our care.

May the spirit of benevolence exhibited by Bro. John C. Sutton—"Uncle John"—take possession of us who remain.

W. Bayard Craig, chancellor of Drake University, came from Des Moines to deliver the address at the funeral of Bro. Sutton. He also preached at the South Broadway Church. His friends were out in large numbers to extend to him a heart-warm welcome. W. B. Craig is loved in Denver. And why should he not be loved? He has done more for the Disciples of Christ in this city than any other man. His service is gratefully remembered. His address at the funeral was one of the best addresses of the kind that I ever heard.

Dr. Craig is full of enthusiasm over Drake University. He is looking for $500,000 for that already great institution. The number of students this year will probably reach 1,700.

Reasons for a Fresh Study of Our Pioneers

By T. W. GRAFTON

To understand social, religious or political movements, we must know something of the men who have inaugurated and championed them. The great Reformation of the sixteenth century would be one of the enigmas of history but for a knowledge of that strong, fearless, defiant champion of the Word of God, Martin Luther, and that group of heroes who gathered about him, and waged successful battle with pen and sword in his cause. The uprising for religious and political liberty, which culminated in the American Revolution and the establishment of institutions that have become sacred to us, would be as vague as the dreams of Homer but for our acquaintance with the purposes and trials and achievements of the pilgrim fathers, in paving the way for the triumphs of freedom.

There is a group of men, whom we now call pioneers, who bear the same relation to the great religious movement which had its inception in the early years of this century. Their lives are so intimately connected with its success that we must know the men if we would understand the genius of the institution they have left us. No religious body has a richer calendar of saints than these. Many of them may have been lacking in the conventional graces of society and in high scholastic attainments, but in the genuineness of their sympathies, and in their familiarity with God's two great books, nature and the Bible, all are, in the highest and truest sense, gentlemen and scholars. When we think of the opposition encountered by them, the hardships endured, the results achieved, it is doubtful if a modern instance can be found that will parallel the brave, noble, consecrated service of the men who followed Alexander Campbell in his search for the scriptural ideal, and in his effort to reproduce it amidst the political, social and religious environment of the nineteenth century on American soil. In making a great cause triumphant they are deserving of our gratitude, and their teachings and examples are themes for profitable study.

1. We need to study the lives and achievements of these men to keep in mind the simplicity of the essential truth which they taught. The tendency of religious thought has always been away from the simpler faith to that which is complex. It is this tendency in the past that has made reformation a necessity. Drift from the apostolic simplicity, and the accumulation of the theological rubbish of centuries, made the Reformation of Martin Luther indispensable to those who would know God's will. The growth of modern speculative theology made the plea of our pioneers for a restoration of apostolic Christianity equally essential. In their singleness of purpose and in their devotion to God's Word, they were peculiarly endowed for the work of eliminating the non-essentials of religious thought from the essentials of scriptural revelation, and of causing the great central truths of the gospel to stand forth in clear and splendid proportions. In the present confused state of speculative thought we are again in danger of missing the main issue, and in our search for a sure foundation can do no better than to restudy the field which they surveyed with such clear vision, and with them again take our stand beside the impregnable rock of revelation, Jesus Christ, the Son of God.

2. A study of such men can but strengthen in us the courage of conviction. Whatever their mistakes or errors, they believed they were right and, having set up their standard on the clear authority of the word of God, they were ready for any sacrifice rather than yield one jot from the truth as they understood it. No better illustration of the temper of these men can be found than this declaration of "Raccoon" John Smith: "For several years past I have stood pledged to meet the religious world, or any part of it, on the ancient gospel and order of things, as presented in the words of the Book. This is the foundation on which Christians once stood and on it they can and ought to stand again. From this I can not depart to meet any man or set of men in the wide world. While, for the sake of peace and Christian union, I have long since waived the public maintenance of any speculations I may hold, yet not one gospel fact, command, or promise will I surrender for the world." In cherishing a charitable recognition of the religious rights of others, we are sometimes in danger of surrendering our own ground, mistaking a lack of deep religious conviction for the spirit of toleration. We need a little of the iron of their faith infused into our blood to-day, and a restudy of their lives and of the sacrifices which they made in their loyalty to the truth as they saw it, will scarcely fail to strengthen our conviction, not perhaps in all that they believed, but in what we ourselves believe, and give renewed courage to stand for its defense.

3. We can not study the lives of our pioneers without an inspiration to personal sacrifice for truth and renewed endeavor in the face of present discouragements. They were not men clothed in soft raiment. Theirs was a garb of homespun, and their daily lot one of deprivation and trial. There were no flourishing churches to welcome them. No tempting salaries emphasized their calls. It was theirs, like the sturdy frontier men to whom they ministered, to hew their way through the unbroken forest. The churches of their religious neighbors were for the most part closed and barred against them. Schoolhouses, barns and groves sheltered them in the deliverance of their message. The bitterness and hate of sectarianism met them in daily encounter. Poverty and hardship was their daily lot. Prejudice and misrepresentation tried their temper. Influence and respectability were arrayed against them. But with undaunted courage they kept on their course, gathering strength with opposition, and hope with adversity, until there burst upon their cheerless path the joy of a great victory, and the satisfaction of having laid strong and secure the foundation of a new religious order. The difficulties before which we shrink to-day are but trifles in comparison with theirs and our trials become invisible in the deeper shadows that enveloped them. A study of such heroism will serve to inspire us to more unselfish service in the cause they have entrusted to us, and with bolder confidence in its ultimate triumph.

4. A study of the principles they advocated is an incentive to a fresh investigation of the fountain of authority from which they drank. Much of the power of these pioneers come from their familiarity with the word of God. It was their library, their school of instruction, their final court of appeal. They searched it as the prospector searches the rock for the gold. They studied it, not to sustain some theological conclusion, but to know the mind of the Master. Like the sword of the cavalier, or the rifle of the backswoodsman, it was always at hand. They read it by the fireside. They carried it into the field and read it while the plow rested in the furrow. It was their companion on the journey from appointment to appointment. They not only read it, but they preached it, drawing from it their message, argument and illustration, until their auditors breathed the very atmosphere of revelation. Their example is contagious. Their loyalty to the word incites a disposition to brush aside the accumulation of literature that has filled our libraries and thrusts itself upon our attention at every turn, and to return to the old, old story, so precious to them, so essential still to a real work of grace in the unregenerate world about us.

5. We are at a remote enough period to fairly estimate their worth and discover and avoid their errors. They were men of like passions and limitations with ourselves, and it is no reflection upon their sincerity to say that they had their shortcomings. In their search after simplicity, they often stripped truth of its beauty. In the intense zeal of their conviction, they were not always free from bigotry. Their sacrifices were not without complaining, and in their allegiance to one book they did not escape the charge of narrowness. But that the treasure was in earthen vessels renders none the less important the service they have rendered us. We are indebted to them. We should know them and cherish their memories. All honor to such a band of worthies, Campbell, Scott, Stone, Smith, Hayden, Creath, Gano, Johnson, Burnett, Richardson, Hashout and those who toiled and suffered with them. By their service and sacrifices they have given us the simpler, clearer vision of divine things which is our heritage.

Current Literature.

Enough time has elapsed since the publication of Count Tolstoy's latest novel, Resurrection, to enable one to form some opinion not only of the book itself, but of its effect. Its appearance in Russia produced a distinct sensation and, while the civil authorities maintained their habitual attitude of good-natured indulgence toward its author, the Church was moved to excommunicate him. Outside of Russia the effect of the book has perhaps been scarcely commensurate with its strength. Perhaps it is that the public has become accustomed to hearing from Tolstoy the sweeping declaration that in modern institutions, civil, military and religious, whatever is, is wrong; or perhaps his arraignment of the Russian judicial system has been accepted as true for Russia, but not applicable to other countries.

The book might be called the story of a trial, including its causes and consequences. The author's description of the steps by which so-called criminals fall into the clutches of the law, the processes by which they are tried and either condemned or acquitted for reasons among which the consideration of their actual guilt is the least important, the manner of their imprisonment and their treatment as Siberian exiles—all issues in the proposition that no man or body of men has a right to punish another man for any crime either real or imaginary. The descriptions of the actual methods of trial and imprisonment exhibit a system which is undoubtedly terribly wrong, but the author does not argue that it ought to be corrected but that it ought to be abolished. His argument from the injustice of the present methods to the abolition of all judicial processes involves the assumption, which he shares with the officials themselves, that the present system cannot be improved. He does not leave the case without adducing texts of Scripture in support of his view: "Let him that is without sin cast the first stone"; and the parable of the servant to whom a debt of 10,000 talents was forgiven.

Incidentally the author advocates the single tax system and the name of Henry George frequently occurs. "We talk much," says Tolstoy, "about the causes of poverty among the people and the means of ameliorating their condition, but we do not talk of the only sure means which would certainly lighten their condition, i. e., giving back to them the land they need so much." Officialism is worse than crime because it makes men cruel by dispensing with the idea of love between the official and those over whom he has authority. "If one acknowledges but for a single hour that anything can be more important than love for one's fellowmen, any crime can be committed without a feeling of guilt." Comparatively little is said about the Church, but what is said is openly hostile to the established Russian Church. "The icon [sacred picture] is the emblem of hypocrisy; the emperor's portrait, the emblem of servility."

The book is a clinic of Russian society—wholesome but not pleasant. Its characters are a group of pathological cases, whose introduction is justifiable only on the assumption that they are not exceptional but typical. In fact, there is something in Tolstoy's method of handling his characters which makes one think of them rather as types than as individuals, and one's attention is held by the problem presented by the millions which they represent, rather than by interest in their fortunes as individuals.

After all, the severest criticism that can be made upon Tolstoy's view of society is that it suggests no positive and hopeful program for the direction of human effort. The wealthy hero of his story disposed of most of his property under the conviction that private ownership of land was wrong, but kept enough to live upon comfortably. After following a band of exiles to Siberia, he came to an intense conviction that the whole idea of human punishment was wrong. No solution is offered to the problem of what a man ought to do who has that conviction. It is somewhat noteworthy that, though the hero gave much of his property to the peasants and denounced the system which had allowed him to inherit vast estates, and voluntarily underwent many hardships, it never seemed to occur to him to do a stroke of honest work by way of paying the debt which he owed to society.

"Resurrection" is as typical of Tolstoy as anything which he has ever written. It breathes the same lofty motives and the same love of humanity and sympathy with human woe. It exhibits the same magnificent literary qualities, not in the least weakened by the author's age and infirmities. And it embodies, too, the same hopeless and futile individualism which has always been the weakness of his philosophy of life and society. (Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.50.)

March Magazines.

Politics and current history figure rather more prominently in the Atlantic this month than usual. The present political situation in Germany and the events of the past year are summed up in "A Letter from Germany." Prof. Woodrow Wilson, in an article on "Democracy and Efficiency," argues for democratic government as not necessarily the best under all circumstances, but the best whenever the circumstances make it possible, and accepts de Tocqueville's opinion that our government possesses the elements of stability, "not because of its intrinsic excellence, but because of its suitability to the particular social, economic and political conditions of the people and the country for whose use and administration it had been framed." The highest virtue of any form of government is that it shall fit. He argues accordingly that the best government we can give to the Filipinos is not necessarily one embodying our own institutions but one which will give them an opportunity to develop institutions of their own which will fit them as ours fit us. Henry B. F. Macfarland writes an article on "Mr. McKinley as President," in which the administration is defended from its critics. "President McKinley has had a great part to play and has played it well." The article, however, has none of the warmth of a partisan document. The article on John Marshall by James Bradley Thayer is timely in view of the recent Marshall centennial. The serials are continued.

Some of the literary aftermath of the South African war appears in Scribner's in Richard Harding Davis' "Along the East Coast of Africa," a description of a journey which was obviously a return trip from the scene of hostilities. "The Fate of Faustina," another of the amateur cracksman series, is the most tragic of the lot so far. Arthur Henry's "Among the Immigrants" is a treatment of the subject on its picturesque and human side, with no attempt to consider its social or economic bearings, except the statement that "it is a mistake to think that this country is being made a dumping ground for Europe's rubbish." The energetic come; the lazy stay at home. Henry Norman's fifth article on Russia deals with the present economic conditions of the empire. "Our Two Uncles" is as good a piece of humorous fiction as has appeared in a year. Its author, Mr. Preston, exhibits the imaginative characteristics of a Stockton.

Irving Bacheller's new novel, "D'ri and I," begins in this month's Century, and its opening chapter is alluring enough to tempt even one who habitually shuns serial stories. The second of Augustine Birrell's articles on the Rhine is even better than the first, and the illustrations represent some of the very best that M. Castaigne has ever done. He has found congenial subjects in the castles, hamlets and legends of this romantic valley. Bishop Potter contributes an article on "Impressions of Japan," in which he defends the Japanese against the often repeated assertion that the alacrity with which they have accepted western ideas and methods betokens a lack of the conservative virtues in their national character.

The Review of Reviews begins with a series of editorials on the Kansas temperance crusade, in which the editor carefully refrains from expressing any very decided opinion on the case but ends in the proposition that "lawlessness is a greater danger than drunkenness at the present time in the United States." The leading article is a character sketch of King Edward by William T. Stead. "Australian Scenes of Country and Town" is the title of an article consisting almost entirely of illustrations. It will be a surprise to most readers to find an article seriously advocating the growth of tea as a profitable crop for our southern states. Prof. John R. Commons writes a strong article advocating negotiation as the correct method of settling labor disputes and cites cases in which it has been used to advantage.

Besides its usual quota of fiction, Frank Leslie's has a much illustrated article on "Scientific Child Study," describing the problems with which this science deals and the methods and instruments which are employed in investigation. Although the Duke of Abruzzi took his polar expedition nearer to the North Pole than Nansen did his, he has never acquired in this country a fraction of the fame which belongs to the Norwegian explorer. An account of the duke's voyage forms a readable and instructive article. An article on the political history of M. S. Quay gives as full a statement of his career and accomplishments as is possible to one on the outside, and, while setting him forth as the complete political boss, treats his case as an object of interest rather than of disapproval.

An uncommonly interesting article on ballooning is found in St. Nicholas as one of the series on "Careers of Danger and Daring." The "Giant Thunder Bones" is a fairy poem on the order of "The House that Jack Built," and is well worthy to be classed with that classic.

Everybody's Magazine contains a character-study of a beaver, somewhat in the vein of Seton-Thompson's biography of Wahb the grizzly, illustrated by a remarkable series of photographs. Bird S. Coler, Comptroller of New York City, has a brief article on the government of that city.

In Tennessee

People Know Something About Coffee.

A little woman in Rita, Tenn., ran up from 110 pounds to 135 pounds in a few months by leaving off coffee and taking up Postum Food Coffee. She had been sick for a long time; subject to headaches and a general nervous condition, with stomach trouble, caused by coffee drinking, and when she left it off and took on Postum Food Coffee she made the change that cured her and fattened her quickly. She says: "I can now do as much work in a day as I want to, have no more headaches, and feel like a new person.

People comment on how well I look and want to know what I am doing. I always say, 'Drinking Postum Food Coffee.'

My husband has been cured of rheumatism by leaving off coffee and using Postum, and his mother, who was always troubled after drinking coffee, has abandoned it altogther and now uses Postum three times a day. She sleeps sound and says she never expects to taste coffee any more." Mrs. L. M. Edmondson, Rita, Tenn.

Our Budget.

—G. K. Berry, late of Ionia, Mich., is preaching for the present at Ft. Collins, Col.

—E. W. Brickert, of Des Moines, recently received a present of a fine horse and set of harness from his parishioners. This is the real thing in the way of a donation party.

—Plans and specifications for a new church at Grand Junction, Col., are in the hands of the contractors for bids. The congregation has increased 33 per cent. in the last six months.

—The church at Gillespieville, Ill., of which J G. M. Luttenberger is pastor, has recently purchased the building vacated by the Lutheran Church. It will be moved to a better location and improved.

—D. W. Moore, pastor of the South Street Christian Church, Springfield, Ill., preached his annual sermon on Sunday of last week. It was reported at length in the Springfield Republican.

—Geo. P. Rutledge, pastor of the Third Christian Church, Philadelphia, preached a sermon recently on modern faith cure in which he let daylight through several of the audacious claims of its devotees.

—If for any reason you failed to attend to the offering for Foreign Missions last Sunday give it attention next Sunday. The whole month of March should be devoted to this cause, or until every church responds As goes the March offering so goes the whole missionary year.

—William Grant Smith, of Delphi, Ind., preached two stereopticon sermons, illustrated with Brother McLean's views of our missionaries and mission stations. This is an effective means for preparing for the March offering and in this case money began to come in voluntarily a week before the appointed day.

—M. L. Sornborger has resigned the pastorate of the Carondelet Church, St. Louis, to take effect April 1, and will enter the evangelistic field. He is an artist with brush and chalk and uses large paintings to illustrate his sermons. He will be glad to go to small and weak churches. Address 6801 Virginia Ave., St. Louis.

—"The Model Conversions, Harmonized and Unitized" by G. W. Hall, pastor of the Christian Church at Ellendale, N. D., is a study of the conversions which are recorded in the book of Acts. It will be helpful to those who are puzzled to understand what is the New Testament teaching in regard to the elements of conversion.

—William Oeschgar, late of Fairbury, Neb., called at our office last Friday on his way to his new pastorate at Vincennes, Ind. He leaves the work at Fairbury in a flourishing condition, having had 100 additions during the past year, and reports that Nebraska is enjoying a season of great prosperity commercially and religiously.

—"A Christian or a Church Member—Which?" is the title of a 26-page pamphlet just published by the Christian Publishing Company for J. G. M. Luttenberger. It treats of a large variety of things including most of the religious fads and foibles of the present day. The pamphlet may be obtained from the author at Dorchester, Ill., postpaid for 15 cents.

—J. M. Blalock, secretary of the Sedalia District Co-operation, held a four weeks' meeting at Malta Bend where the church had fallen into decay and the building had been closed for several months. The church was organized with about 60 members and a Bible-school with 35. A preacher will be employed. More funds are needed for the work in this district and the churches which belong to it are urged to send an offering to James A. Gordon, Marshall, Mo.

—F. L. Davis, who is now at Tama, Ill., can be engaged for evangelistic work or for supply work for a time. Weak churches which can pay only small salaries need not hesitate to write to him.

—Mrs. W. J. Lhamon gave an illustrated address on "Familiar Faces in the Foreign Field" at Shady Ave., Allegheny, where Herbert Yeuell ministers. It was greatly enjoyed by the large audience and will help the March offering.

—A. P. Stout writes that he is not preaching regularly for any church now but is working constantly on the revision of his chronology of Christ's life. On Feb. 24 he delivered his 283d public address on "Trial and Cruxifixion of Christ." Brother Stout has done some remarkably faithful and painstaking work in the study of the life of Christ and its results cannot fail to be of much permanent value.

—Beginning with the issue of last week the Central Christian Register, formerly published at Kansas City, will be issued from the press of the Christian Publishing Company at St. Louis. The Register was acquired by this company some months ago and by bringing it to this office it will be possible to reduce some of the expenses of publication with no increase of price. No change is made in editorship or in the staff of contributors.

—Sherman B. Moore, pastor of the Compton Heights Christian Church, St. Louis, has received and accepted a unanimous call to the pastorate of the church at Atlanta, Ga., from which C. P. Williamson has just resigned. Brother Moore has served as pastor of the churches at Selma, Ala., Chattanooga, Tenn. and Memphis and Galesburg, Ill. It is not improbable that his father-in-law, J. B. Briney, will go with him to Atlanta.

—We are grieved to learn of the death of Mrs. Plattenburg, wife of our beloved Bro. George Plattenburg, of Dover, Mo. He writes on Feb. 27: "Mrs. Plattenburg died last night at ten o'clock after a month's sickness of pneumonia. She was about 63 years of age, a member of the Christian Church about 47 years. We were married nearly 45 years ago. She died apparently a painless death." The sympathy of many friends will be with him.

—The appeal published elsewhere in the interest of an endowment fund for the College of the Bible at Lexington should be read carefully and should meet with a ready response. The work of education, like the cause of missions, is a matter in which the success of one institution is a help to all. Hiram College has had good success with her endowment fund, thanks to the energy of President Zollars. President Kersey of Bethany College has quietly raised $50,000 for that institution and is well started on a second $50,000. Drake is making a strong appeal for additional support. Butler Bible College is calling for the endowment which it needs and heartily deserves and the College of the Bible at Lexington is beginning a new fund. These various appeals should not stand in each other's way in the least and it is no mere editorial non-partisanship when we wish them all the greatest success.

Spring Medicine

Is of the greatest importance. This is the most critical season of the year, from a health standpoint.

It is the time when you imperatively need Hood's Sarsaparilla.

It will give you a good appetite, purify and enrich your blood, build up and steady your nerves, overcome that tired feeling, give mental and digestive strength — in short, will vitalize your whole being, and put you in perfect health.

Don't delay taking it.

Don't experiment with others. Get that which trial and test have proved the best—

HOOD'S Sarsaparilla

Best for Spring – "I have taken Hood's Sarsaparilla when needed for several years and would not be without it in the house. It is an excellent medicine and I heartily recommend its use in the spring and at any time when a blood purifier and tonic is needed." MRS. F. M. FOOTE, 21 Irving Place, Passaic, N. J.

Spring Fever—"I have taken Hood's Sarsaparilla for my spring medicine for years and have always found it reliable and giving perfect satisfaction. In the spring it takes away that tired feeling or spring fever, gives energy and puts the blood in good condition." MISS EFFIE COLONNE, 1535 10th Street, N. W., Washington, D. C.

—The following from a letter from Bro. W. Pinkerton, of Gillespieville, O., gives a vivid picture of the situation in one region of Ohio:

"We whose homes are among the hills of old Ross county, Southern Ohio, are in very moderate circumstances. This is not a good place for preachers or evangelists. As for pastors, there could be no such thing as 'locating' one here. Only by itinerating among the churches, or 'classes,' Methodist fashion, could adequate work of that kind be done. It would be hard work and poor pay. I have thought that it would be better not to organize churches in places so far from the centers of population. True, a few earnest disciples of the Master could meet and worship in country places. But if any considerable expense is to be incurred for building a suitable chapel, supporting the gospel, or instructing the congregation, it would require the united means and efforts of an entire community to insure success. Public sentiment in favor of union ought to become so strong in every religious community that Christians of all persuasions would be compelled to unite even if it would be necessary to convene and discuss matters of difference till agreement be reached. Christians could do this; sectarians never. But we need, in this twentieth century, men able to bring the people together, hold them together and lead them, as anciently a shepherd led his flock into 'green pastures and beside the still waters;' men who are willing to do faithfully the 'work of evangelists,' and to follow evangelistic labor by patient pastoral labor for the good of the flock and not for the fleece."

—Since last report the American Christian Missionary Society (Home Society) has received $1,200 on the annuity plan and $1,000 as a direct gift to the A. C. M. S. Of the former, $500 comes from Bro. and Sister Everman, of Burlington, Ind., $200 from Bro. Emmor Strawn, of Salem, O., and the other $500 from a sister who wishes her name withheld. The direct gift of $1,000 comes from Dr. G. W. Taylor, of Princeton, Ill. In addition to the foregoing, a bequest of $3,462.50 has been received from the estate of Mrs. Annie J. Watters, of Pittsburg, Pa. We are in correspondence with a number of others concerning annuities. If you are interested, write to B. L. Smith, Y. M. C. A. Building, Cincinnati, O., for a booklet concerning annuities.

March Offering Returns.

The reports from the March offering for Foreign Missions are splendid. We feel greatly encouraged. Every church heard from so far has exceeded its apportionment; many have doubled, yea, and even trebled their apportionments. We are highly elated. Go ahead, brethren, the $200,000 is just within our grasp. Below we give a sample of the good words:

Sullivan, Ind.—Went beyond our apportionment.—M. W. YOCUM.

Paris, Tex.—More than raised apportionment.—J. N. CRUTCHER

Sterling, Ill.—Went beyond our apportionment. Church is happy.—W. E. SPICER.

Paris, Ky.—Paris doubles her apportionment for Foreign Missions.—LLOYD DARSIE.

Pittsburg, Pa. — Hazelwood Christian Church has exceeded its apportionment.—A. E. ZEIGLER.

New Orleans, La.—Church here raised apportionment and more for Foreign Missions. —M. PITTMAN.

Angola, Ind.—Glorious day. Usual $500 offering, but differently apportioned this year. —C. S. MEDBURY.

Owensboro, Ky.—Our offering yesterday will amount to $125 or more. Apportionment $100.—R. H. CROSSFIELD.

Coal Centre, Pa.—Offering last year $2 00, apportionment this year, $15.00; offering yesterday $140; will make it $200.—W. D. CUNNINGHAM.

Paducah, Ky.—Good meeting this morning. Considerably over $100 pledged, and pledges are number one. Are considerably encouraged. W. H. PINKERTON.

Barry, Ill.—Our attendance was small this morning, but the offering exceeded the apportionment by about $15. We hope to increase it some by a little personal work.—F. M. ROGERS.

Augusta, Ky.—Have $15 75 up to date at Augusta. Hope to receive a few dollars more. Have made a good beginning with the offering at Brooksville and Minerva. The total from my field we hope to make as much as or more than last year.—H. C. BOWEN.

Richmond, Ind.—We had a great day here. Collection for Foreign Missions $93.53. We are all happy and glad that we can share in carrying the light to those in darkness. Also had two additions at regular services to-day. Yours for the Old Jerusalem gospel.—E. V. SPICER.

Springfield, Mo.—We took all our offerings for missions yesterday for the year 1901. We are in sight of $500 in cash and pledges. This does not include C. W. B. M., Junior and Bible-school work. This is much the largest in the history of the church. Glorious day.—D. W. MOORE.

Humors feed on humors—the sooner you get rid of them the better—Hood's Sarsaparilla is the medicine to take.

YOU SHOULD NOT NEGLECT YOUR KIDNEYS.

Because if Kidney Trouble is Permitted to Continue Fatal Results are Sure to Follow.

Weak and unhealthy kidneys are responsible for more sickness and suffering than any other disease, and if permitted to continue fatal results are sure to follow.

Your other organs may need attention—but your kidneys most, because they do most and need attention first.

So when your kidneys are weak or out of order you can understand how quickly your entire body is affected and how every organ seems to fail to do its duty.

If you are sick or "feel badly," begin taking Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney, liver and bladder remedy, because as soon as your kidneys are well they will help all the other organs to health. A trial will convince anyone.

Among the many cures of this wonderful medicine, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the ones which are published this week for the benefit of CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST readers speak in the highest terms of the wonderful curative properties of this great remedy:

DES MOINES, IA., Oct. 20, 1900.

"I had been out of health for a long time, and I was taking medicine from a doctor's prescription when I received your sample bottle. I stopped taking the doctor's medicine and used the sample bottle of Swamp-Root. I afterwards took two of your large bottles, bought at my drug store, and they cured me entirely, and have not felt so well for years. I thank you very much for sending me the sample bottle."

D. W. SMITH, 1821 Center St.

D. W. SMITH.

MRS. H. N. WHEELER.

Mrs. H. N. Wheeler, of 117 High Rock St., Lynn, Mass., writes on Nov. 2, 1900: "About 18 months ago I had a very severe spell of sickness. I was extremely sick for three weeks, and when I finally was able to leave my bed I was left with excruciating pains in my back. My water at times looked very like coffee. I could pass but little at a time, and then only after suffering great pain. My physical condition was such that I had no strength and was all run down. The doctors said my kidneys were not affected, and while I

Did Not Know I Had Kidney Trouble,

I somehow felt certain my kidneys were the cause of my trouble. My sister, Mrs. C. E Littlefield, of Lynn, advised me to give Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root a trial. I procured a bottle and inside of three days commenced to get relief. I followed up that bottle with another, and at the completion of this one found I was completely cured. My strength returned, and to-day I am as well as ever. My business is that of canvasser, I am on my feet a great deal of the time, and have to use much energy in getting around. My cure is, therefore, all the more remarkable, and is exceedingly gratifying to me." MRS. H. N. WHEELER.

Swamp-Root will do just as much for any housewife whose back is too weak to perform her necessary work, who is always tired and overwrought, who feels that the cares of life are more than she can stand. It is a boon to the weak and ailing.

Sample Bottle Free. The mild and immediate effect of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney, liver and bladder remedy, is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases. Swamp-Root will set your whole system right, and the best proof of this is a trial.

You may have a sample bottle of this famous kidney remedy, Swamp-Root, sent free by mail, postpaid, by which you may test its wonderful curative properties for such disorders as kidney, bladder, and uric acid diseases, poor digestion, when obliged to pass your water frequently night and day, smarting or irritation in passing, brick-dust or sediment in the urine, headache, backache, lame back, dizziness, sleeplessness, nervousness, heart disturbances due to bad kidney trouble, skin eruptions from bad blood, neuralgia, rheumatism, diabetes, bloating, irritability, wornout feeling, lack of ambition, loss of flesh, sallow complexion, or Bright's disease.

If your water, when allowed to remain undisturbed in a glass or bottle for twenty-four hours, forms a sediment or settling or has a cloudy appearance, it is evidence that your kidneys and bladder need immediate attention.

Swamp-Root is pleasant to take and is for sale the world over at druggists' in bottles of two sizes and two prices—fifty cents and one dollar. Remember the name, Swamp-Root, and the address, Binghamton, N. Y.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—If you have the slightest symptoms of kidney, liver or bladder trouble, or if there is a trace of it in your family history, send at once to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., who will gladly send you by mail, immediately, without cost to you, a sample bottle of Swamp-Root and a book containing many of the thousands upon thousands of testimonial letters received from men and women cured by Swamp-Root. When writing be sure to say that you read this generous offer in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, St. Louis.

Youngstown, O.—We took "The Offering" this morning at Central Christian Church. Our apportionment was $50, but we could not stop there. We raised instead $154.80 cash on hand, with more to hear from. We are all full of joy in consequence. God grant that the $200,000 may be forthcoming.—WALTER S. GOODE.

Correspondence.

Missouri Ministerial Institute.

To THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—I hope that our Missouri preachers are making their arrangements to attend the coming meeting of our Institute at Fayette, March 18-21. It is the one occasion in the year on which we meet to discuss the themes of most vital importance to us as ministers of the gospel of Christ, and every preacher ought to make an earnest effort to be present. A most excellent programme has been prepared, and the church at Fayette extends a cordial invitation to all who will come. While it is especially desired that all our preachers shall attend, all of our brethren and sisters will receive the same hearty welcome. Will not some good brother or sister in each church urge upon the preacher to go and accompany him if possible? Fayette, March 18-21.

Debate on Mormonism.

The debate which was held in the North Side Christian Church, Omaha, between D. H. Bays, Disciple, and H. C. Smith, Mormon, closed Feb 19.

The first proposition was that the Book of Mormon is of divine authenticity and contains a revelation of God's will to man. Their main arguments on this proposition are from Scripture and American Archeology. I give below the Scripture texts upon which Mr. Smith and all other Mormons base their argument for the Book of Mormon. Get the true meaning of these passages and you can meet any Mormon on his argument from Scripture: Gen. 48, 49; Deut. 33; Is. 18:1, 2; Is. 29; Ezek. 37; Ps. 85; Hosea 8.

The argument from archeology is put in the form of a syllogism. The Book of Mormon, published in 1830, describes a people who worked in cement and made cloth. Discoveries subsequently made on the American continent show that the aborigines of this country worked in cement and made cloth. Therefore the Book of Mormon is divine. These are the best arguments Mormons can make for their fraudulent book. If you can meet them you need not be afraid of Mormons anywhere.

The second proposition affirmed that the New Testament is the final and complete revelation of God to man.

Bro. Bays so argued and his defense of the New Testament was a splendid effort. But Mr. Smith did not put the Book of Mormon on an equality with the New Testament. He argued that God still communes with his people—that he gives his spirit to those who obey him. In the entire discussion he used the word revelation in the sense of communion.

In the third proposition Mr. Smith affirmed that his church was the church established by Jesus Christ and his Apostles. Bro. Bays' answer was summed up in a diagram showing the works of the New Testament church in one column and the works of the Latter Day Saints in the other. The works of the Latter Day Saints were taken from their own inspired (?) books. Twelve points of difference were noted. The only answer Smith made to this was, "It is all bosh." When asked to point out the discrepancies, he said, "The order is not right."

In the fourth proposition Bro. Bays affirmed that the Christian Church is the church established by Jesus Christ and his Apostles. His argument was summed up in a second diagram showing the points of identity between the Christian Church and the Apostolic Church. The only answer Smith made to this was, "Bays wrote that." "All other Protestant churches believe all that."

Mr. Smith declared that Alexander Campbell "wrote a discipline for the government of the church." When asked to produce it he read from the Christian System the chapter on "The Christian Discipline."

He declared that we have the office of Patriarch and in proof read from an article recently written by Bro. Lamar in which he referred to Thos. Campbell as "the patriarch, Thos. Campbell." Such trickery we had to contend with all through the discussion.

The London Temperance Hospital.

The readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST are wide-awake on all philanthropic and moral enterprises that affect the home. It is not presuming too much when we take it for granted that the friends of the Church of Jesus Christ and of the morals of the community are total abstainers, uninterested in the progress of the temperance cause in any part of the world. Any agency which minimizes the liquor power or works destruction to its nefarious business is welcomed heartily by the temperance host. So long as physicians prescribe alcohol for medicine and lead the people to believe it is indispensable in various diseases, though they in many instances start their patients on the drunkard's road, that long will intemperance increase.

To show by scientific methods touching all manner of diseases that alcohol as a medicine is dispensable, the London Temperance Hospital was founded. This hospital was established in 1873, and in the 28 years of its life it has grown until it occupies a stately building with 100 beds, medical and surgical wards, equipped with all the modern appliances and apparatus. The physicians and surgeons, with the matron, sisters of the wards, the 34 trained nurses, equal in skill and ability those of any hospital in London. It is a Protestant institution.

A patient will not be allowed to die if the administration of alcohol will, in the judgment of the attendant physician, save him, but when alcohol is given the physician must record all the particulars of the case, including "time, quantity and the reasons for administration." The effect of the dose, also, shall be noted, and the full record signed and printed in the annual report. Hedged about so carefully, no physician will risk his reputation when the case can be judged by others, equally competent, years afterwards.

From the 27th annual report it is shown that a total of 16,628 patients occupied beds for treatment; 88,543 were out-door patients. The death rate was about seven per cent., which is not greater than other hospitals of the city. Only 36 out of this multitude were given alcohol. Most of these were in stages of disease where strychnine, digitalis and the usual heart stimulants failed. Of these 36 persons, it is to be noted, however, all did not live, though alcohol was administered to save them. The influence of this demonstration upon other hospitals has been very marked; the amount of liquor formerly used is greatly reduced. The number of cases for which it was prescribed was fewer and the times given to patients materially lessened.

As a general hospital, it has a large place in the hearts of all who have received treatment under its roof and have felt the kindly, Christian spirit that controls it. The writer's personal observation and experience, as a typhoid patient for many weeks, justifies the statement that this institution is unique in the field of temperance reform, and merits the highest praise for professional skill and excellent care shown its patients. It is to be hoped that American travelers visiting London will not fail to visit the Temperance Hospital, and if any should be so unfortunate as to become ill while in the city, their greatest hope of recovery will be to secure the care of that institution.

The College of the Bible Endowment.

(Lexington, Kentucky.)

There is no more hopeful indication for the future of our work as a people than the gradual awakening of interest in our colleges. We are coming to realize what a potent factor they have been in our growth and development thus far. We are also beginning to recognize the debt we owe them. They have had a long and lonely struggle in the prosecution of their immensely important work. A grateful people recognizing the value of our institutions of learning in the promotion of our plea will not longer allow them to suffer for lack of sympathy and support. The adequate endowment of our colleges is now our paramount duty. What we need is not more colleges, but more college endowment.

The trustees of the College of the Bible have asked me to become its financial secretary and my work will be so to increase the endowment of the college as to place it on a solid financial basis for all time to come. It has always had a very limited income, sometimes hardly sufficient to meet the actual necessary expenses. The finances have been managed from the first with singularly good judgment and according to sound business principles, and yet it has had to practice the most rigid economy and sometimes has been compelled to incur debt. The College of the Bible is dear to the hearts of the entire brotherhood. It is not a state institution, for its students come from almost every state and from many foreign countries, and the men it has sent out are to be found everywhere. It has had over 400 graduates and perhaps twice that number have partially completed the course.

My work has already begun and the outlook is full of hope. I shall go among our churches in Kentucky and in other states and present for their consideration what the College of the Bible has done for the cause and what we owe it in return. Where the privilege is given, I shall preach a sermon along the line of the growing need of educated, thoroughly equipped men in the ministry and the debt we owe our colleges. I make no appeals from the pulpit.

In view of the recent death of the saintly Robert Graham, who gave the best years of his consecrated life to the college, serving as its president for twenty and as one of its professors for twenty-three years, and who was known and loved by his brethren everywhere, it has been decided to name the first fifty thousand dollars raised the Robert Graham Memorial Fund. It will be a labor of love upon the part of thousands of his brethren to aid in erecting this imperishable monument to the memory of this great and good man. Will all who read this and the many thousands who have been blessed by his beautiful, consecrated life, send us a liberal contribution or pledge to this memorial fund? Large gifts from those that are able, but something from everybody, is the ideal we hope to realize. My permanent address is Midway, Kentucky.

M. D. CLUBB, Financial Secretary.

Undenominational Christianity.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—An editorial in your issue of Feb. 7, I have read with much interest, as I am wont to read your paper each week. The editorial is entitled, "How Can This Be?" and while I do not presume to answer the question I should like to offer a reflection or two.

You ask Pres. Booker T. Washington to explain how a school can be strictly undenominational and yet thoroughly Christian, but I have no doubt, Mr. Editor, that you are willing to admit that there are schools that are undenominational and still are Christian in management and make-up, as is Tuskegee. They are Christian in spirit, in aim and in administration but are not allied to any denomination for financial support nor for pupils.

However, when we come to talk about people's uniting together along church lines for worhip, fellowship and service there is a difference. They always have one or more characteristics that are different from what others hold or emphasize, and that separate them from others. In an extended study of the denominations in the United States I have failed to find any company of people that do not have some feature that is exclusive, i. e., that do not have some belief or practice that excludes other sincere Christians. I have an idea that if I should apply for membership in a church of the Disciples of Christ I should have to be immersed although I believe that I have been truly baptized by sprinkling. I do not believe that an undenominational, Christian school would exclude a person for this or similar differences. I am inclined to think, however, that if the graduates of Mr. Washington's school should form a local congregation, as you suggest, they would be very apt to establish some practice or some interpretation that would characterize them and separate them although "they should decide to call their congregation a church of Christ, and themselves Christians or Disciples of Christ, and to accept the New Testament as their rule of faith and practice." They would no doubt be called a sect and heretica and become a denomination. Perhaps some of us are very stupid when we think that an individual's interpretation of the New Testament, or that of a number of individuals, is pretty much the same thing as a creed. It is the differences of interpretation that cause the divisions and make unity impossible.

I do not think that denominations that stand for some definite, distinctive principle which they deem important are always to be deprecated, provided they have the true spirit of "unity in essentials, liberty in non-essentials, and charity towards all." And why should a people that have had such a growth, done such a work, and attained such a position in this country as the Disciples of Christ so seriously object to being known as one of the leading denominations of the United States? I have great interest in the history of the Disciples and great respect for their achievements. This letter is not written in the spirit of criticism or of controversy but as the reflections of a student.

Grow Rich, Mr. Farmer.

Every farmer is ambitious to put aside a snug sum for the later years. Well, that is just right, but why not grow rich double quick? You can do it. How? By planting a plenty of John A. Salzer Seed Company's La Crosse, Wisconsin grown seeds. You see Salzer breeds his seeds up to big yields, as the farmer breeds his cattle to their highest point of merit. The result is, Salzer's seeds sprout, grow and produce enormously. We know of many a farmer whose granaries had to be built larger and whose barns needed additions put on, on account of sowing Salzer's seeds; that's good, prosperous news.

The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will positively withdraw its club rates of $1.25 in clubs of ten and $1.00 in clubs of twenty-five on April 3rd.

All orders for Clubs received in this office before the close of business on April 3rd will be filled. After that time the regular rate of $1.50 a year will be required.

All congregations which are at all interested in the matter of Good Literature should use the next few weeks in an earnest effort to place the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in every home of their membership at the present club rates, which are not more than one half what the paper is really worth.

Our reason for with-drawing the club rates is that we cannot profitably publish the paper at those prices and maintain its present high standard of quality.

A Craving.

Nature Hints to us of Food That is Needed.

It is interesting to know that food alone, if of the right kind, will surely cure most diseases.

A young lady in Corry, Pa., was seriously ill as the result of two serious falls, and from overwork, was an invalid for 5 years. She says: "It was impossible to gain strength. I had to lie down most of every afternoon whether I had company, work or pleasure I wanted ever so much to enjoy.

"Two months ago I began using Grape-Nuts Food and experienced a gain in strength at once. In less than a week I did not require more than an hour's rest, and now when I have eaten my dinner, of which Grape-Nuts forms the most part, I am not obliged to go to bed, but go to work or play instead. I am always hungry for Grape-Nuts, for they satisfy some craving I can scarcely define.

"A friend of mine is nursing a 5 months old baby, she is inordinately fond of Grape-Nuts Food, but found it necessary to forego the luxury of the usual amount because it increased the flow of milk so much as to cause discomfort."

Philadelphia Endeavorers.

The fourth annual rally of the Y. P. S. C. E. of the Christian churches of Philadelphia, Pa., convened Saturday evening, Feb. 23rd, at the Kensington Christian Church, Philadelphia, of which Raymond A. Smith is minister. Mr. Hugh Fox, president of the Kensington Society, presided. A full house was in attendance. Representatives were present from the young people's societies of the First Church, Robt. Graham Frank, minister; Third Church, Geo. P. Rutledge, minister; Fourth Church, O. R. Palmer, minister; Sixth Church, Arthur Holmes, minister, and Twenty-fifth St. Mission, C. C. Green, minister. Also delegations of young people from Sixth Reformed Presbyterian Church, Providence M. E. Church and Mt. Pizgah Church of United Brethren participated in the exercises of the rally. The following addresses were filled with information and inspiration: "Training of the Younger C. E. Members," Arthur Holmes; "Local Unions," R. A. Smith; "C. E. and Home Missions," Geo. W. Hughes; "The Quiet Hour," C. C. Green; "Decision Day Idea," O. R. Palmer. In his report of the work of the Y. P. S. C. E. of the Third Christian Church, Brother France told us of Father Endeavor Clark's acknowledgment of the fact that the great work of the Disciples of Christ along the line of Christian union prepared the way and made possible the great movement which he founded.

The Home at Hot Springs.

The organization of the Christian Home movement is complete and the work of raising $75,000 begun. Many brethren have written me in regard to this enterprise. The leading question asked by all is, "Can you raise so much money?" We think so. "Why do you think so?" Because the great need of the home is bound to appeal to the brotherhood.

It is true, I'll admit, that it will take a long time to fully inform our people as to the suffering of our brethren but when we do they will give. We never have had any fear about raising the money. I had a letter from a sister who knows the need of this work, saying, "I am preparing to leave you half of my home place."

Governor Davis says in his letter of recommendation: "I also note who are the officers composing the Board of Trustees and from my personal knowledge of them and for the peculiar adaptation which your city has for an institution of this kind, I cheerfully and heartily recommend the same to all." Brethren, what stronger recommendation could the board have than this? George R. Belding, mayor of Hot Springs, says in his recommendation: "The Christian Home will redound to the credit of advanced civilization and suffering humanity. I earnestly implore all people to encourage and assist in this noble enterprise." Given under his hand and seal, Jan. 24, 1901.

In the face of such recommendations our great-hearted brotherhood ought not to wait longer, but answer our call for 50,000 $1 offerings for this work.

No one needs to be told to try to cure a cough. But any one will be glad to be told of a means of cure which will be thorough and lasting. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is a medicine which can be confidently relied on to cure diseases of the organs of respiration. It cures obstinate, deep-seated coughs, bronchitis and bleeding of the lungs. It cures when nothing else will cure, and the local physician says: "There is nothing more that we can do."

There is no alcohol in "Golden Medical Discovery," and it is absolutely free from opium, cocaine and all other narcotics.

The dealer, tempted by the little more profit paid by less meritorious medicines, will sometimes try and sell a substitute when the "Discovery" is asked for. No substitute medicine will satisfy the sick like "Golden Medical Discovery." It always helps. It almost always cures.

"Two years ago a severe cough started on me and I was also bothered with catarrh," writes Mr. F. Skjod, of Danewood, Chisago Co., Minn. "I could not sleep nights, as the cough was worse at night. I tried several cough medicines, but to no avail, until a year ago, when I got so bad I could not breathe through my nose at times. I then tried Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. After taking eight bottles of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and at the same time using Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, I am a well man. I can thank Dr. Pierce for my good health, and will recommend his medicines to any one suffering from the same trouble."

Ohio Letter.

The chief item of interest among the Disciples of Ohio is the great meeting at Dayton. It will, undoubtedly, be the greatest meeting ever held in this state by our people. The seventh week is now coming to a close and up to the 20th, 436 people had been received. The grand total will reach near 500. This church will now have over 1,100 members. It will be the largest congregation in the city of 85,000 people. This is the only church standing for New Testament Christianity in Montgomery county. Bro. Cahill will have an assistant pastor as soon as one can be found. It is also hoped that very soon the second church will be organized. Four other evangelists came to work in four leading churches at the same time, but none of them did anything. They have been trying to close the meeting for two weeks but it will not close. Wilson and Huston go from Dayton to Steubenville. Bro. Kerns is bishop there and will be a fine yoke-fellow.

Secretary Bartlett is already booming the state convention at Akron, which will be held May 20-23. C. W. Huffer, O. L. Cook, J. M. VanHorn, J. H. Goldner, G. W. Speer, W. A. Harp and John R. Ewers are among the native talent on the program. H. L. Willett will give the Bible studies and also one address. Get ready now to attend.

The new $12,000 church at Glenville has been dedicated. Z. T. Sweeney preached the sermon. Geo. Anderson is at the helm as pastor and will build up the church.

Randolph Cook, of Metropolis, Ill., has taken up the work at Chillicothe under the direction of the state board. This looks like the state board meant business and was going to establish the work in this difficult field.

J. L. Smith has located with the church at Jackson.

Dr. Susie Rijnhart spent a recent Sunday at Ohio's capital. She has a wonderful story to tell. Her talk thrilled the people. It was a fitting preparation for the March offering. She ought to be kept busy among our churches.

Justin N. Green has resigned as pastor at Richmond St., Cincinnati, to accept the position of assistant secretary of the Foreign Society. His work will be among the young people. He preaches for the church until a new pastor can be secured. We congratulate the Foreign Society on this addition to its force.

D. W. Besaw is at Mt. Victory in a meeting and also trying to restore harmony in the church. The devil has done some very effective work there and Bro. B. is trying to cast him out.

The first ten days of the meeting at McArthur have resulted in 20 accessions. A pastor will be located. C. A. FREER.

Columbus, Ohio.

Virginia Notes.

P. A. Cave, of Hagerstown, Md., has been called to the pastorate of the Third Church, Richmond, to succeed R. S. Maxwell. Bro. Cave will be quite an addition to the Virginia forces.

Henry P. Atkins, of Harrodsburg, Ky., has been extended a call to West End, and we hope he will accept and come to Virginia. We need our Virginia forces recruited and the recruits must come from other states, as there are not men enough in the state to fill the vacancies. Virginia has her preachers scattered all over the union.

W. E. Powell, pastor of Group No. 1, Southeastern District, has entered upon his new year with bright prospects. The brethren have purchased a tract of land and are making preparations to build a parsonage at once.

C. E. Elmore has taken charge of the Spray, N. C., work, and we confidently expect good reports from there soon.

F. F. Bullard reports three additions to the Lynchburg Church on last Lord's day. All branches of the work seem to be in a very prosperous condition.

C. O. Woodard has, we understand, been called to take charge of the Petersburg Church. This is a good field and plenty of energy and consecration will make it bloom as the rose.

I. Bauserman, of Missouri, formerly of Virginia, has been extended a call to the Crewe work.

R. W. Lilly is ready for the fray. A parsonage is now under construction for him and he is hoping for a prosperous year all along the line. We are to hold two meetings for him in April.

We regret to record the death of Sister Webb, grandmother of W. G. Johnson, a Craig boy who is the efficient pastor at Wilson, N. C. In her last moments she said: "It is well; I am just waiting."

The writer will take up the work at Montgomery, W. Va., the second Lord's day in March. A great work is here to be done. Montgomery, W. Va., will be my address after March 8. J. C. REYNOLDS.

PLANT SEED CO. St. Louis, Mo.

GIANT FLOWERING CALADIUM, "NEW CENTURY."

A New Species, and the Grandest Foliage and Flowering Plant yet Introduced.

Leaves three times as large as any other Caladium, having a heavy, leathery texture and a bright, lustrous, glossy-green color, which is remarkably handsome. It does not produce a bulb, but is increased by suckers, and is perennial. The leaf-stalks are strong and tall, holding the mammoth leaves well above ground. Leaves 3 to 5 feet long by 2 or 2½ feet broad; perfectly immense, and make a plant which for tropical luxuriance has no equal. Added to this wonderful foliage effect are the mammoth lily-like blossoms 12 to 15 inches long by 7 inches wide; snow-white, changing to cream, with a rich and exquisite fragrance so powerful as to perfume a whole garden, filling the air with fragrance for a long distance. Plants bloom perpetually all summer in the garden, or all the year round in pots. Not only is it the grandest garden or lawn plant, but as a pot plant for large windows, verandas, halls or conservatories, it rivals the choicest Palms in foliage, to say nothing of its magnificent flowers. Thrives in any soil or situation, and grows and blooms all the year. As many as 6 to 12 flowers rise successively from the base of each leaf-stock. Regardless of all we can say, the plant will astonish every one; so novel, effective and fragrant.

Strong plants, which will bloom this summer, 50 cts. each: 3 for $1.00 postpaid.

Hale, Mo., Mar. 1.—I have been visiting some of the weak churches in North Missouri. There are many churches which are not able to pay for one-fourth time, they do not even feel able to pay railroad fare and entertain a preacher to hold a meeting for them. The Lord's cause needs more money for home missions. I spent one week at Bonsworth, there are about 30 Christians there, they have no house, but there is talk of building one this summer. The anti-faction has one but in bad shape. I spent the second week of February at Rockford church. They have a good house and 40 members. These two churches are trying to raise money to employ the writer part of his time. The church at Mendon has a good house and about 25 members. We have several small congregations in Howard, Carroll and Chariton counties which have no preaching unless it is given them. H. Drennen is in a meeting here now. Bro. Vanhorn is at Sumner holding a meeting this week and Bro. R. H. Love is at Bogard in a meeting.—R. D. OSBORN.

Baker occupied the pulpit in the A. M., and received three by letter. I occupied the pulpit in the evening and two united with us, one by confession, and at the close a sister was baptized. Summary of the work done in the absence of Bro. Turner: Four additions by letter, one by baptism, one by confession.—CHAS. W. SHULL.

Joplin, Mo., Mar. 2.—During January and February we received 15 additions here at the regular services as follows: By letter, eight; by statement, three; by confession, four. O. ROUTH, evangelists.

$500 raised and about $700 in pledges for pastor coming year. Church greatly revived. These evangelists instead of draining a church of its funds make money for a church.—W. T. HACKER, pastor.

Beallsville, O., Feb. 25.—There were three confessions and one reclaimed at our regular Lord's day service.—H. C. PARSONS.

Dayton, O., Mar. 1.—In spite of rain 600 people attended the reception to new members last night. Two confessions; three confessions and one from Baptists the night before at prayer-meeting; 499 since beginning of the meeting. Wilson and Huston are master workmen. They do honest work.—I. J. CAHILL.

McArthur, O., Mar. 2.—Closed a 19 days' meeting here last night. The result was 29 baptisms and six by statement. One came from the Mormons. Lilian Pearl Perrin led the singing. The church is in excellent condition and will be ministered to by J. T. Bridwell after April 1.—C. A. FREER.

Mt. Vernon, O.—S. H. Forrer is helping me with a meeting here since Feb. 11; 7 added to date, all baptisms. Turning people away from doors.—KENT PENDLETON.

Uhrichsville, O., Feb. 25.—We have just closed our revival meetings with 75 additions. The pastor, J. P. Allison, began the meetings with home forces but at the end of two weeks was taken down with la grippe. F. H. Simpson, of Massillon, was called. Bro. Simpson was called home several times, during which intervals Elders J. W. Kerns, J. S. Raum and C. E. Taylor ably assisted us. During the present pastorate there have been 266 additions, 93 of which have not previously been reported. Among the number baptized was a lady over 83 years of age. Our Bible-school for the last six months has had an average attendance of 200, an increase of 50 over any like period of previous years.—J. P. A.

Shawnee, O. T., Feb. 25 —I closed a two weeks' meeting at this place last night with 44 additions. John Henry McQuerry is the pastor. Have had 94 additions in the last seven weeks.—JOHN A. STEVENS.

Seiling, Okla.—J. W. Van De Walker, of Iowa, just closed a meeting with the Seiling church of Christ with six additions, four by obedience. In November, Bro. Ben Matchett, of Abilene, Kan., closed a ten days' meeting, six additions.—ALBERT JONES.

Allegheny City, Pa., Feb. 23.—We have had seven additions at the First Church since last report at regular services; six by confession and baptism.—W. J. LHAMON.

Alleghany, Pa.—Herbert Yuell continues his work at Shady Ave., Allegheny, at an increase of salary and a unanimous call. There have been 57 added during the year. All departments prospering. Since he came into the Pittsburg district two and a half years ago he has had 286 additions.

Clarendon, Tex., Feb. 26.—Three additions lately. A sermon on "Mrs. Carrie Nation and the Saloons" filled our house and stirred our people up to a commendable prohibition sentiment. I desire a few meetings during the spring and summer, in order to splice out a small salary while doing mission work in this frontier field. Would like to arrange with two or three churches in Kansas, Oklahoma or west Texas. — ARTHUR W. JONES.

Daingerfield, Texas.—Have been preaching in the Methodist Church here twice daily for 10 days. Only six members here. Close tonight. This has been a seed-sowing. I go to Brookston, Tex., Sunday, for the dedication of their new house, then home to my work in Paris.—JAMES N. CRUTCHER.

Everett, Wash.—Evangelist L. F. Stephens and wife closed a three weeks' meeting here Feb. 17, with 36 additions, 14 by letter and statement; 22 by primary obedience.—JOHN YOUNG, pastor.

Tekoa, Wash., Feb. 23.—Our meeting closed last night. Bro. Wigmore, of Palouse, Wash., did the preaching. Closed with full house, good interest, best of order. Results of meeting. 16 additions, six by baptism.—E. A. LADOW.

The Warrior's Prayer.

Long since, in sore distress, I heard one pray,
"Lord, who prevailest with resistless might,
Ever from war and strife keep me away,
My battles fight!"

I know not if I play the Pharisee,
And if my brother after all be right;
But mine shall be the warrior's plea to thee—
Strength for the fight.

I do not ask that thou shalt front the fray,
And drive the warring foemen from my sight;
I only ask, O Lord, by night, by day,
Strength for the fight!

When foes upon me press, let me not quail,
Nor think to turn me into coward flight.
I only ask, to make mine arms prevail,
Strength for the fight!

Still let mine eyes look ever on the foe,
Still let mine armor case be strong and bright;
And grant me, as I deal each righteous blow,
Strength for the fight!

And when, at eventide, the fray is done,
My soul to Death's bedchamber do thou light,
And give me, be the field or lost or won,
Rest from the fight!

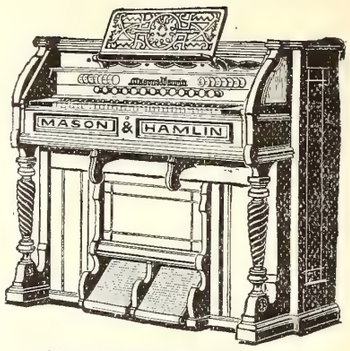
My Neighbor Wrens.

A Story of Bird Friendship.

[During a temporary sojourn in the South the editor of this paper became acquainted with Miss A. McC. B., an intelligent and refined lady, who has been most of her life an invalid. She related to him the following remarkable bird-story, which he wrote down in substantially her own words, hoping it might prove as interesting to many of our readers as it was to him and cause them to cultivate more friendship with our little feathered neighbors. EDITOR.]

Several years ago I spent much of the time during the summer months in a large summer house which stood at the side of our garden, close to a low picket-fence that divided our yard from our neighbors'. But while in this pleasant retreat I had a nearer neighbor than the family in the next house, for a pair of wrens had chosen to build their nest in a tin can tied to a small pear tree which grew in the narrow space between the fence and the summer house. The location pleased them so well that they returned to it five years in succession. I think that an earthen dish kept in the shade of some shrubs and daily cleansed and refilled with fresh water was an assurance to them of our friendliness. There were many cats in the neighborhood and whenever one of these came in sight of Mr. Wren's keen, watchful eyes, he always gave a shrill cry of alarm. We soon came to recognize this note and my nurse would always hasten to drive the cat away, and the grateful little bird never failed to break forth into joyous song to express its appreciation of its deliverance. During the first year of their stay they had become so confiding that when the little birds were ready to leave their nest the mother-bird coaxed them to the railing of the summer house, she herself having first come over and inspected everything very carefully, eyeing me in a shrewd way from head to foot, but whenever any other member of the family came out she withdrew her brood to the fence railing which was only two feet distant. I think the reason for this partiality to me was, that I was careful not to startle her by any sudden movement.

One bright summer morning on awaking we missed Mr. Wren's cheerful song. One of the family hastened to the garden to find that the cause of his silence was a very sad one indeed. The cozy little nest was torn from the can and its fragments with its broken eggs lay scattered upon the ground.



Mrs. Wren sat upon the corner of the stable with drooping head and wings, uttering at brief intervals a low, plaintive cry, as hopeless a sound as I ever heard. Mr. Wren was absorbed in trying to cheer his little mate.

He would fly about the garden inspecting different places and try to coax her to accompany him, but it was not until the fourth day that she went with him to look at a bird house perched on the top of a post in a yard adjoining ours at the rear. After a great deal of chattering and chirping they decided to take a room there for the rest of the season and build again.

In a short time Mrs. Wren was brooding there on another nestful of eggs. But the cats had discovered their new quarters and while they could not reach them they would sit about and gaze up at the birds in a threatening manner. The first we knew of this was Mr. Wren's flying down to the summer house in which I was sitting with my nurse, and uttering shrill cries which we translated, "Cats! Cats!" Then he would fly back between the summer house and the nest, keeping up his call note and evidently trying to secure our intervention to protect him and his mate from their old enemy. This intention was so evident that my nurse accompanied the bird to his nest, found the cat there and drove him away. During the week that followed the bird called on us several times daily to render this service.

One afternoon the nurse came back and reported Mr. Wren mistaken; she could find no cat. Mr. Wren came back with her to the summer house and protested that he was not mistaken. So I persuaded my nurse to go back with him the second time. She returned in a few moments saying there was no cat there, but accompanied by the bird, who was quite frantic. He sat upon the railing of the summer house and looking straight at me, scolded with all the energy he could command. His cries, as I translated them, seemed to mean, "Oh you stupid creatures, who can't see a cat when it is pointed out to you!" The nurse understood him, too, and said to him, "Now, Mr. Wren, you are a bad bird to-day, and are not telling the truth, and I shall not go with you again!"

I felt sure that so intelligent a bird would not call for help in this way unless some danger threatened the nest, so I said, "Oh well, I will go with him this time and see if I can learn the trouble." The nurse said: "But how can you go, you can't walk that far." I asked her to bring the camp chair for me, and we three started, Mr. Wren being in high glee. But when I stopped to rest on the way, his patience gave out entirely, and he darted about so fiercely that I feared he might thrust his sharp bill into my face. At last the high board fence across the end of the lot was reached. Leaning against this I first looked up at the bird house, but saw nothing amiss there. Then I noticed Mr. Wren was darting into and out of the elderberry bushes that grew on the opposite side of the fence. I shook the bushes, but no cat ran out. I was about to turn away when the bird darted close to my face and then down toward the ground close to the fence. Following the direction he had taken I pushed the bushes back and looked down into the yellow eyes of a big cat crouching by the fence. Instantly he was driven off. Mr. Wren seemed to forgive us our stupidity as he burst forth into the most joyous song.

We had our reward, for when the young wrens were hatched and were large enough to move, they were brought down to the summer house by the parent birds and left there in my care during the day, and at night were taken back to the nest. In this way I had opportunity to notice the care of the parent birds for their young, and to witness their growing confidence in me and their increasing familiarity with me. When I would go out in the forenoon and in the afternoon I would find three or four of the birdlings seated upon my invalid chair. They would then take their place upon the railing near me, or sit upon the arm of my chair. If any other member of the family came out to the summer house, they would cautiously remove to the fence.

A Skeleton Proposal.

A young lady was acting temporarily as hostess, and was much occupied. One of her admirers, a nervous and absent-minded lover, had determined to bring affairs to a point that evening. He didn't get a chance. "Afterward," says the object of his ill-starred devotion, "I found this memorandum on the floor, where he had dropped it in his agitation. It read thus: 'Mention rise in salary. Mention loneliness. Mention pleasure in her society. Mention prospects from Uncle Jim. Never loved before. Propose.'"—Collier's Weekly.

Baby Lions Going to Bed.

Baby lions, as well as baby boys and girls, need fresh air and sunshine, so, at the Washington Zoo the baby lions have summer quarters where they can run and stretch their limbs in a freedom somewhat akin to that of the jungle. So well do they like their outdoor quarters that they will not go in at the closing time, although their big, tender mother urges them by all the ways of which she is mistress. A novel method has been resorted to in order to get these big babies into their cage without hurting them, for gentleness is one of the rules at the Washington Zoo, and no animal is punished where humane treatment will answer. When the animals are called to their quarters the three baby lions poke their wrinkled noses close to the bars and settle themselves down as if to protest against going to bed. Then a watchman approaches with a hose and shoots a stream of water close to their small, snarling faces. Then back go the kittens by the great rocks to the cavern-like door of the inner cage, followed every step of the way by the man with the hose. Finally, the three small heads disappear and the sliding door hides three pairs of eyes from glaring out into the darkness. Baby lions do not like water—at least, not on their smooth coats—and the animal keeper, who has noticed a kitten stop and shake a protesting foot on a wet pavement, has turned his observation to good account in getting these giant pussies to bed.

Filling in the Chinks.

"Oh, I just fill in the chinks."

The girl laughed as she said it, but her mother added quickly: "The chinks are everything. You haven't the slightest idea what a help she is, and what a load it lifts from my shoulders, this filling in of the chinks, as she calls it."

The busy mother spoke warmly as she smiled happily at her daughter.

"You see, when she was through school there didn't seem to be anything definite for her to do. Her father and I wanted her at home, for a while at least, before she undertook to go out into the world.

"Our one servant does all the heavy work, of course, and I'm kept pretty busy with the children, and so she looked around and noticed the little things that should be done to keep a home neat and orderly, and which a servant never does, and I have very little time for. The left overs, I always call them; oh, it's such a comfort to have them done."

"And what are they?" I asked of the girl, as she sat pulling out the edges of a lace mat, and making it look fresh and fluffy.

"Oh, I don't know!" she answered. "There are so many of them, and such little things, you know."

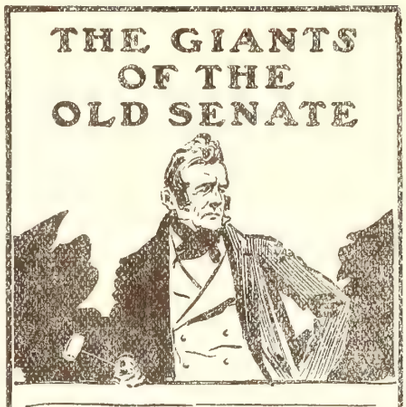
She spoke almost apologetically.

"Let me see. Well, I begin in the parlor, of course. All girls do at first. There were some little silver vases that were seldom shined. I kept those bright, and the silver on the afternoon tea-table. You have no idea how much it tarnishes. And the little cups always dusted, and doilies fresh and clean, and the tidies also. Really, that is a work by itself, and mother used never to have time. Then the picture molding. The brass hook that holds the picture cord was never dusted. I kept those clean.

"Then the bedrooms; I look out that there are fresh towels on the bureau and stand, and the hair-receivers are not jammed full.

"It is really too funny the way I found them packed when I first began. And the soap dishes clean; and fresh soap when needed, and dusters in their bags, and waste-baskets emptied—oh, yes, and buttons sewed on to the shoes. I believe I sew on a half dozen every day.

"I go over the house daily, in the morning, right after the children are sent to school.



"I begin by picking up things they have dropped, and putting them in their places.

"Then I go into the library; sharpen the pencils that need it; fill the inkwell; see that the pens in the penholders are good, the blotting-pad not too old, the waste-basket empty; and then I go through the other rooms, and, if you believe me, I always find something to be done, something aside from the regular work of cleaning up, sweeping or bed-making—these belong to the girl to do.

"You see I only do the little things that get left for the general cleaning, or neglected altogether.

"It is very pleasant, and helps—at least mother says that it does."

"Yes," said the mother, "and no one knows what a difference it does make in having those chinks filled."—Good Housekeeping.

Mamma—Did you beg God's pardon for being naughty, as I told you to?

Dorothy—Yes, mamma.

Mamma—And you think He forgave you?

Dorothy—Yes'm. He said: "Don't mention it. I've got worse children up here than you."

Ruth was watching mamma for the first time prepare some hominy for breakfast. "What is that, mamma?" she asked. "It's hominy," said mamma. Ruth still looked puzzled, and pretty soon she said again, "What is that?" "Hominy," answered mamma once more, and somewhat impatiently. Ruth looked at her and said, "Why, I don't know how many!"

An American staying with his wife at the Hotel Cecil in London retired somewhat late. He tapped at the door of what he imagined to be his room; and, finding it locked, he called, "Honey!" No answer came, and he called again and more loudly, "Honey!" This time a reply came, and in a male voice. "Go away, you blithering idiot! This is a bath-room, not a blooming beehive!"

Life in a Flat.

Many a little thing has a big name and the following, as told in the Youth's Companion, shows true insight into our multum-in-parvo methods of modern city life, even if we call our flat an "apartment" or a "suite."

"Where's your daughter Mary living now, Mrs. Herlihy?" inquired one of the neighbors, who had dropped in after an absence of some months.

"Her hoosband's got a foine job on the Toimes, reporting accidents," said Mrs. Herlihy, proudly, "and the two av thim and little Moike is living in a suit uptown."

"What's a suit?" inquired the neighbor, curiosity having got the better of a desire to appear well-informed on all points.

"A suit," said Mrs. Herlihy, slowly, "is one of o' thim places where the parloor is the bedroom, and the bedroom is the kitchen, and the closets is down in the cellar, and the beds is piannys,—or organs, and—well it's one o' thim places where iverything is something else," concluded Mrs. Herlihy.

"Don't Tell"

One day when auntie was out of the room, Charlie and Frankie tipped over a bottle of ink which stood on her desk.

"Don't tell her," whispered Charlie; "we will shut the door and run away, and she'll never know who did it."

"But we ought to tell her," urged Frank, "and say that we are sorry."

"No, don't tell; it's ever so much easier not to," said Charlie.

"I'm going to tell her this very minute, before it gets any harder," said brave little Frankie.

When he had found auntie and told her, she hastened to her room and wiped up the ink, and she put some salts of lemon on the ugly spots that it had made on the carpet. "I'm so glad you told me at once," she said, "for if it had dried in, it would have ruined my carpet and desk. Now I don't think it will show at all."

"It's just like God's forgiving us, isn't it?" asked Frankie. "If we tell him about our sins right away, and tell him we are sorry, and ask him to forgive us, he does; and we are made happy again."

Might Have Been Worse.

It is a matter of common knowledge that in many private schools prizes are distributed with such bewildering liberality that few or none escape. A boy of six years returned one day from such a school bearing proudly the first reward of merit which he had been able to win in ten weeks.

"Good," said his mother; "but how did you gain it?"

"I was first in natural history."

"Natural history at your age? How did that happen?"

"Oh, they asked me how many legs a horse had."

"And what did you say?"

"I said five."

"But a horse hasn't five legs."

"I know; but all the other boys said six."

"What's the matter, Johnnie, you seem to be feeling good?" asked one of his father's neighbors.

"Great! We got Christian Science over to our house," said the boy, as he munched one doughnut and waved a second in the air.

"Christian Science? What do you mean?" inquired the puzzled neighbor.

"It's just immense!" cried the boy. "Best thing that ever happened. It's just the boss, I tell you!"

"I have heard that it sometimes did wonders," observed the neighbor, "but I didn't suppose boys knew much about it. Has it benefited you, Johnnie?"

"Benefited me!" echoed Johnnie. "You just bet it has! It's great! When you're Christian Science, you know, you ain't never sick. Benefited me? I should say it had. I kin slosh around in the snow all day now and eat fourteen doughnuts and ma never says a word, fer I can't be sick—see? I just can't be sick!" — Harper's Bazar.

In a suburb of Philadelphia lives an old German couple named Skimmekopf. The husband, Fritz, has two dogs, of which he is very fond. One is a pup, while the other is quite old; but, as sometimes occurs with dogs of different breeds, the old dog is much smaller than the six-months-old puppy. "Dere was somedings funny apoud dem dog alretty," said Fritz, who was showing them to a friend the other day. "Dot leetlest dog vas de piggest." Mrs. Skimmekopf, realizing that her husband had not made the point quite clear, thought she had better come to his assistance. "You must excuse mine husband," she said. "De English languidch he knows not goot. Vot he means is dat de youngest dog vas de oldest."

In the biography of Dr. Hawtrey, a famous English schoolmaster, there is a description of his unkempt appearance, and the story of an artless criticism thereon. He was one morning reproving a boy who was tardy at his lesson, and the pupil asserted that he had no time to dress.

"But I can dress in time," said Dr. Hawtrey.

"Yes sir," replied the boy, innocently, "but I wash.

If any reader suffering from rheumatism will write to me I will send them, free of cost, a trial package of a simple and harmless remedy which cured me and thousands of others, among them cases of over 40 years' standing. This is a grand remedy, and want every afflicted reader to learn by actua test what marvelous power it has, and therefore will gladly send a sample free, even if more than 15,000 invalids should apply. Distressing cases of rheumatism, among them bedridden and crippled persons, were completely cured, of which I mention a few: A lady in Denham, Ind., writes that this remedy cured her, and she then cured 15 of her neighbors. In Lyon, Mo., it cured an old gentleman at the age of 82, who had been a sufferer for 40 years. In Seguin, Tex., it cured a case of 41 years' standing. Hon. Jacob Sexauer, of Fountain City Wis., was cured after suffering for 33 years and after having employed 7 physicians. Miss Emma Callender at 130 Oak St., Vincennes, Ind., was cured after she was given up to die. Rev. S. Sund of Harrisville, Wis., writes that the remedy had cured two members of his congregation, one who had suffered 15, and the other 25 years. Thousands of similar instances could be mentioned, showing that here is a remedy that can be relied upon. A TOUR
Is incomplete if you have not made a trip on the celebrated Union Pacific Train, "The Overland Limited," which runs between Missouri River and California in fifteen hours quicker time than any other train. Fitted out in regal splendor. Of this train Admiral Beresford says:

"Why, I never saw anything like it, and then, too, this Dining Car System—it is grand. The appointments of the Union Pacific Trains are a constant source of surprise to me."

In the Country.

It seems to me I'd like to go
Where bells don't ring, nor whistles blow,
Nor clocks don't strike, nor gongs sound
And I'd have stillness all around.

Not real stillness, but just the trees'
Low whisperings, or the hum of bees,
Or brooks' faint babbling over stones
In strangely, softly tangled tones.

Or maybe a cricket or katydid,
Or the songs of the birds in the hedges hid,
Or just some such sweet sounds as these
To fill a tired heart with ease.

If 'tweren't for sight and sound and smell,
I'd like a city pretty well;
But when it comes to getting rest,
I like the country lots the best.

Sometimes it seems to me I must
Just quit the city's din and dust,
And get out where the sky is blue;
And say, now, how does it seem to you?

A Middleman.

I went fishing the other day for trout in a small country stream which I have always held sacred even from my closest friends of the rod. I had no luck, and was on my way home when I met a small boy with a long string of fine trout. His outfit would have caused a horse to laugh, but he had the fish, and I had none, so I did not feel like laughing myself. With my guying friends in mind, I struck a bargain with the urchin, paying him three prices, and went on my way rejoicing. Two days later I visited the same stream and had the same luck, not even hooking the big one that always gets away. Coming out I met the boy again, carrying another string of trout, and we struck another bargain.

"See here," said I, somewhat exasperated at his luck, "I'll give you fifty cents if you will tell me how you manage to get such a string of trout every day."

The boy held out for a dollar and got it.

"It's jest this way," said he, "all the kids around here fish more or less and sometimes they catch one or two, and I go around and buy 'em up; then I sell 'em to some greeny that ain't had no luck. I ain't caught a fish myself this year. I ain't had time," he added, with a grin.

It is a great scheme, and I don't begrudge him the money that he made out of me.

The Wrong Handle.

Stories of the blower going to sleep are common enough, but some of them are no doubt apocryphal, says the London Musical Opinion. Of such, very likely, is that one of the railway porter who, being wakened, hurriedly shouted out: "Change here for Dunkeld and the North."

A well-known organist has told how one of his first blowers had an inconvenient trick of going to sleep during the sermon and not waking at its conclusion. One Sunday evening there was no wind for the hymn after the sermon. The organ had a very noisy action, and the organist rattled the keys well in order to wake up the blower, but without success. As last one of the choirmen went to the rescue and began working the lever, at the same time administering a kick to the sleeping blower. That functionary awoke with a start, and hearing the sound of the organ at once mechanically caught hold of the nearest object and began to work it up and down. As this object happened to be the leg of the man who had aroused him, the poor choirman was overturned and lay on the ground in his surplice and cassock, struggling with the blower, who did not relinquish his grip until the wind went out with the usual ghastly wail, then he realized that what he had got hold of was not the proper lever.

Jenny Lind's Determination.

"You must change your entire method of singing," said a famous teacher of vocal technique in Europe. She knew that the greatest and most successful singers then before the public had been his pupils, and had followed his method of voice-building.

But how could she afford to throw away those three years of patient practice, go back and change and undo all that she had laboriously accomplished hitherto? The sacrifice seemed too great. Would it pay? She was already a good singer. Her voice was one of exceptional power and sweetness. The temptation was strong to be content with what she might become under the old method, even if it were not the best. She went to her room and thought it all over. Finally she said to herself: "The time will come when I shall weep for this moment if I let it pass. I am determined to be content with nothing but the best that is possible for me, no matter what the sacrifice may be."

In the morning she went again to the famous teacher and told him that she was ready to begin her musical education afresh, according to his method. That young woman was Jenny Lind.—Ram's Horn.

A Mammoth Watch.

There will be a mammoth watch at the St. Louis World's Fair in 1903. The watch will have a polished metal case and will lie on its back and be so large and roomy that people will be able to walk around inside of it among the moving wheels. It will be nearly seventy-five feet in diameter and more than forty feet high, with neat little stairways running all about it. The balance wheel will weigh a ton and the "hair-spring" will be as thick as a man's wrist. The mainspring will be three hundred feet in length and made of ten sprung steel bands, two inches thick, bound together. Guides will point out and name every part. The watch will be wound by steam regularly at a certain hour during the day.

It is interesting in this connection to read that there is in Berlin a watch which measures one fourth of an inch in diameter, its face being about the size of the head of a large sized tack or nail. It weighs less than two grains Troy and keeps perfect time.

ONE very cold day Tom, in his first trousers, was walking with his tiny overcoat turned back to its utmost limit. "Tom," said his father, meeting the child, "button your coat." But the boy demurred. "Look at mine," added his father. "Yes," said Tom, ruefully, and obeying under protest, "but everybody knows that you wear trousers!"

Disproportionate.

Short Stories prints an anecdote of a Western judge who, although he is wise, does not mind being witty.

When he was trying a case recently he was disturbed by a young man who kept moving about in the rear of the court-room, lifting clairs and looking under things.

"Young man," the judge said, at length, "you are making a great deal of noise."

"Your honor," replied the young man, "I have lost my overcoat and I am trying to find it."

"Well," said the venerable jurist, "people often lose whole suits in here without making all that disturbance."

PETE.

XII.—Arthur Tells a Story!

Tuesday evening Miss Dollie told Linda May she could go to see Madge; so she went, right after school. They sat on the grass in the front yard on a pile of autumn leaves that had fallen early. There were not many leaves, but they pretended like there were, and rattled and rustled them luxuriously. There were Linda May, Madge, Pete, Letitia and Mrs. Bimby's daughter, Eliza. Eliza did not belong to their "set," but she had come to call on Madge, so what could you do? Only hope that she would go away.

"Let's talk about my party," said Linda May.

Madge rolled her eyes at Linda May. You see, Eliza Bimby hadn't been invited, so here was a delicate situation. "Oh, yes," said Linda May. "Well, girls, any more candy found in boxes?"

"Only in mine," said Letitia. "The others don't put out their boxes any more. I find candy in mine ever' night. I won't get to come to the party."

"Hush, Letitia!" said Pete. Then she added, "Neither will I. Say, Linda May, what kind of ice cream are you going to have?"

"Pineapple flavoring."

"I don't like pineapple flavoring," said Madge. "Why don't you have chocolate?"

"Aunt Dollie likes pineapple," said Linda May, "and I like it pretty well, myself."

"Well, you needn't have any pineapple for me," said Madge impolitely. "I think chocolate ice cream is the best thing that was ever made. More so than bananas."

"I like pineapple best," spoke up Eliza Bimby.

"Well, you ain't invited, anyway," observed Pete, "so it don't matter what you like."

"I know I'm not invited," said Eliza simply. "But if I had of been invited, I'd a-preferred the pineapple."

"Well, I would of invited you," said Linda May, "but you know, Eliza, when you had your party you left me out."

"Did I?" said Eliza, as if trying hard to remember. "I can't think what made me."

"I can't either," said Linda May promptly.

"I can," said Pete. "Don't you know, Eliza, you never went with us girls? You didn't have any of us. We wasn't your set. You ran with that Grace Pullum, and whatever she said to do, you did it."

"But since then," said Eliza, "I've called on all of you, and I don't do all Grace Pullum says, either. And 'fide have a party this very night I'd invite Linda May; and I think she might invite me, too!"

"'Fi invited you," said Linda May, "I'd haf to invite Grace Pullum and all that gang. So I can't invite you. It's the principle I look at. Say, Madge, any boy ast you yet?"

"Oh, oh!" cried Madge, "Wait till I get it!" She ran into the house. "You see," said Pete to Eliza, "the big girls has comp'ny to Linda May's party. 'Fi could a gone, mene Letitia, we wouldn't of had to of taken boys with us, 'cause we're little, ain't we, Letitia?" Madge now appeared with a note. At first she held it behind her, next she showed just a little corner of it, at last she took Linda May aside and showed it in profound secrecy, and it ended by the note's being passed around the circle. It read thus:

"Say Madge,

Don't you want to go with me to Linda May's party?

Your obedient servant,

Arthur Pendleton."

"I know where he got 'obedient servant,'" said Linda May, "it was in our composition lesson yesterday. I guess he thought this was a business letter."

"Arthur never went with a girl before," said Letitia in an awed voice. "I wonder how he'll like it?"

"The boys will plague him to death, I expect," said Madge. "I'm glad it was him asked me, 'cause living next door to him all my life, and he being Letitia's brother makes it like it was all in the family, you know."

"Madge never was out with a boy before," said Pete.

"No," said Madge, "but it ain't like it was a boy, you know; it's just Arthur. So I told him I'd come, and I expect my note made him mad, but he'll get over it before Friday."

"Why?" asked Eliza. "Whad jew answer him?"

"I wrote to him, 'Say Artie, I don't care if I do,' and signed myself, 'Your master, Madge.' Linda May, what games are you going to play?"

Pete jumped up. "I'm not going to stay and hear about it," she said. "Come on, Letitia! We can't go to the party, and hearing of it is just an aggervation."

"I'm going to listen at it," returned Letitia. Pete said, "I'd be more independent!" Then she ran to the fence, pausing on the way to clutch at her garter, because you have to keep that up, whatever happens. Pete perched upon the gatepost and whistled, so she could not hear the others discuss the party. Then along came Mr. Edgar Brown. "Good-evening, Pete!" If he had said "Hello," he would have made a better impression. "Good-evening" sounds too much like a laundered collar and squeaky boots. So Pete said "Good-evening" in a distant manner.

"You don't seem to be enjoying yourself," said Edgar. After his adventure with the ladder he felt that Pete should have been more friendly. "I'm miser'ble," said Pete, thawing out. "They're talking 'bout Linda May's party, and I ain't to go, 'cause I slipped out of my room to talk to Nap. I slid down the bedclothes all fastened together. I wish you could of seen me!" Pete began to laugh. "I just squeezed the sheets between my toes like passing them through a wringer; and my hands felt red hot when I reached the ground. I haven't ever told on you, Mr. Brown, so you can breathe easy."

"Thank you," said the young man. "Is your mother at home? Then I will come in." He came in the yard and the girls on the grass looked at him in surprise. They were afraid he would come and talk to them, so they were "feared" to speak. Because, how can you have any fun if a grown man comes into your circle? Especially a grown man you don't understand. However, Edgar went straight to the front door and knocked, and Mrs. Morris appeared. Pete had run up to the porch, and she introduced them with great solemnity, turning to wink slyly at the other girls.

"Mrs. Morris," said Edgar, after refusing to "come in," "I have been told that you sold your horse and buggy a short time ago, and that you would be willing to rent out your barn, and sell the hay in the loft." Mrs. Morris told him that this was the case. "I have just come to town," said Edgar, "and I have my eye on a horse which I hope to get at a bargain. If you will rent your barn to me, it will be a favor. I have noticed that it opens on the back street, so I can use it without entering your place or causing you any inconvenience." So Mrs. Morris rented him the barn, and he went away, although he would have loved dearly to stop and enjoy the picture made by the girls in their laughing talk. Pete accompanied him to the gate. "Now, Pete," said Edgar just before he went away, "the barn is my property while I'm in town. And I'd like to see your tramp try to sleep in it!" "Oh, Mr. Brown! Was that what you did it for? Now I tell you what; I'll take Madge aside and tell her about you, and work her up to the point of being willing to get to know you. You come along to-morrow evening, after school—with some candy— and come right in, and we'll keep you from feeling so lonesome over that sweetheart of yours that married another gentleman." "I might come in, now," said Edgar, looking back wistfully over the fence. "No," said Pete firmly, "I wouldn't advise it. Madge is taken up with Linda May's party. You come when her mind's empty."

The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful it Is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines, and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking, or after eating onions or other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion; it whitens the teeth; and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics, in tablet form, or rather in the form of large, pleasant-tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood; and the beauty of it is that no harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

Jesus and Pilate.*

The threefold trial of Jesus before the Jewish tribunal was now ended. His death had been determined upon, and it only needed that the Roman governor, Pontius Pilate, should pass sentence and the Nazarene could be crucified. The members of the council therefore repair at an early hour to the palace of the governor, the splendid edifice erected by Herod the Great on Mount Zion, southwest of the temple hill. Pilate had been governor of Judea for six years, and already felt his crown and even his life in peril. He had on several occasions angered the Jews, who hated him most cordially, and he knew that frequent complaints were going up to Rome, to the suspicious and cruel emperor, Tiberius. He was forced to compromise, throughout the whole disgraceful scene of Jesus' trial, between his own convictions of right and the passions of the lawless mob that demanded the blood of an innocent man—unless, indeed, he chose to be a man rather than a ruler, and to maintain his integrity at the cost of his office or his life, and such a thing would of course be absurd to a consummate politician like Pilate.

Jesus was led into the palace, the chief priests and elders refusing to enter the Gentile judgment hall, John tells us, lest they should be defiled, and made unfit to eat the sacred food of the feast then in progress! It would have been dreadful for those murderers to walk on the pavement of a Gentile court! Almost as bad, perhaps, as for a Roman Catholic criminal to eat meat on Friday, which they have been known to refuse with horror! What a travesty on religion is this! Pilate therefore came out into the open court and asked for the charges against the prisoner. When told that he had sinned against their law, he bade them take him and condemn him themselves, since Rome gave them authority to punish religious offenses. But they wanted him crucified, and this they were not permitted to inflict. They, therefore, preferred three charges against Jesus, namely, perverting the nation, forbidding men to pay tribute to Cæsar, and claiming to be a king. These were all false, as they well knew.

Pilate entered the palace and asked Jesus whether he were indeed the king of the Jews, that being the one charge which seemed to him of greatest moment. The Savior explained that his kingdom was a spiritual one, having for its purpose the enthroning of truth in men's souls, and not the swaying of a scepter over their temporal interests. Returning to the crowd Pilate assures them that he can find no fault in the prisoner. With loud outcries they insist that Jesus had been a disturber of the people both in Galilee and Judea. When Pilate heard that the prisoner was from Galilee he eagerly seized at what seemed an escape from responsibility. Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee, was in the city, and Pilate commanded that Jesus be taken to him for judgment. Herod was pleased with this mark of consideration, for he and Pilate had been at outs for some time. Then, too, he desired greatly to see this teacher of whom he had heard so much. But to all his questions and his requests for a display of miraculous power the Savior made no reply. He would not gratify the curiosity of this base murderer of his faithful herald, John the Baptist. Then Herod repeated the infamous scene enacted in the palace of the high priest. Putting on Jesus a robe of royalty in mockery of his humble and despised condition, they heaped upon him the same indignities he had already suffered, the story of which is too sorrowful to linger upon. Then Herod sent him back to Pilate. This brings us to the point at which our lesson begins.

Again, Pilate called together the chief priests and elders with the multitude which had gathered around them, and declared that neither his examination nor that of Herod had discovered any fault in their prisoner. He therefore proposed to release him as an innocent man. But, realizing how unwelcome this decision would be to Jesus' enemies, he basely proposed to scourge him before letting him go—an act wholly contrary to every idea of right and justice and worthy of such a craven coward. It was the custom of the governors of Judea to pardon some prisoner at the time of the Passover feast as an act of gracious favor to the people. Such a request was now made of Pilate and he suggested that Jesus be the one chosen for executive clemency. He knew that the Savior had been prosecuted through the envy of the leaders of the people, and he was determined to deliver him from their hate if it could be safely accomplished. "Shall I release unto you the King of the Jews?" asked Pilate. "Not this man, but Barabbas!" came the answer in a chorus of maddened shouts. Barabbas was a robber and murderer who had led in a seditious disturbance, such as they had falsely charged against Jesus. But the guilty man they wanted discharged and the innocent one punished. While this scene was transpiring a messenger came from Pilate's wife, Procula, urging him to do nothing against Jesus, because she had just had a strange dream concerning him which convinced her of his innocence. Greatly troubled in spirit, Pilate again appealed to the multitude to let him scourge Jesus and release him. In a frenzy of rage they cried out that Barabbas should be given his freedom. "What then shall I do with Jesus, which is called Christ?" asked Pilate, and with one voice they cried out, "Crucify him! Crucify him!" Oh, Pilate, if thou couldst only have risen to the occasion and exercised thy authority as governor and judge to protect this patient and innocent sufferer, how brightly thy name wouldst have shone among the base crowd of Jesus' enemies! But by thy cowardice and desertion of that Immortal Prisoner thou hast won pre-eminence in the annals of human baseness.

From the narrative of John we learn that Pilate, before delivering Jesus to the soldiers to be crucified, scourged him, and then brought him out unto the multitude and made one more appeal for mercy. Hoping that the spectacle of the silent and patient sufferer would move the hearts of the people to pity, he called out, "Behold the man!" They saw before them the form of the Nazarene, bowed under the weight of the long hours of sleepless and cruel suffering, the crown of thorns pressed upon his brow and marking it with crimson drops, his body robed with purple in derision, and the clotted blood flowing from his shoulders, cut and torn by the cruel scourge. His face bore the marks of their contempt, the vile spittle of his persecutors polluting his holy countenance. Even this spectacle did not move their hearts of stone, and they renewed their cries that he should be crucified. How little did any of them understand the significance of Pilate's words, "Behold the man!" They little realized that the world would catch up his expression and make it an eternal tribute of honor to the world's Redeemer. "That 'Ecce Homo' of his sounds over the world and draws the eyes of all generations to that marred visage. And, lo, as we look the shame is gone; it has lifted off him and fallen on Pilate himself, on the soldiery, the priests, and the mob. His outflashing glory has scorched away every speck of disgrace and tipped the crown of thorns with a hundred points of flaming brightness." A new cry was at this moment heard by Pilate which gave him fresh alarm. "He ought to die because he made himself the Son of God!" Pilate was superstitious, as all cravens are, and he took Jesus aside once more to see what this accusation meant. He could not understand the high thoughts of Jesus, but he felt more than ever that he was innocent of wrong. Once more he appealed for mercy, but now his soul shuddered as he heard voices calling out, "Thou art not Cæsar's friend!" He feared to meet that cry. "He thought of Tiberius, the aged, gloomy emperor, then hiding at Capreæ his ulcerous features, his poisonous suspicions, his sick infamies, his desperate revenge." Maddened by their threats, he cried out, "Shall I crucify your king?" They answered, "We have no king but Cæsar!" Thus did Israel once for all reject her Messiah and accept in his stead the rule of the idolatrous and polluted Gentile.

Baffled in every effort to change the mind of the multitude, Pilate called for a basin of water and washed his hands before them, saying, "I am innocent of the blood of this righteous man: see ye to it!" Nay, thou unjust judge, thou art not able to wash the stain off with water, no, not of a thousand seas. It clings to thee eternally. Listen to the mad cry of the chosen people, Israel, "His blood be on us and on our children!" In awful measure has this malediction been fulfilled. Judas and Pilate died by suicide. Herod ended his days in infamy and exile. The house of Annas and Caiaphas was shortly destroyed by a mob of their countrymen. "They had forced the Romans to crucify their Christ, and though they regarded this punishment with especial horror, they and their children were themselves crucified in myriads by the Romans outside their own walls, till room was wanting and wood failed, and the soldiers had to ransack a fertile inventiveness of cruelty for fresh methods of inflicting this insulting form of death."

Fainting from weariness and loss of blood, Jesus bore for a little way upon his shoulders the timbers for his cross, when he fell prone on the ground. It was manifest that he could bear it no further. Simon, a Passover pilgrim from Cyrene, a province of northern Africa, who perhaps had shown some sympathy with the victim of their malice, they seized, and made him bear the cross to Golgotha. This mark of shame, as they intended it to be, was in after years reckoned a high honor, and his sons, Rufus and Alexander, became well known and faithful disciples.

Christian Endeavor

TOPIC FOR MARCH 17.

Christ our High Priest.

(Heb. 7:24-28.)

Whenever God seems to a people very great and very much removed, dwelling in the obscurity of clouds and smoke, enthroned afar, there is felt by that people a deep need for priests to mediate between them and their God. Indeed, most of us, in the measure that we feel the almighty power and majesty of our God, can sympathize with this yearning for a priesthood. God sometimes seems so exalted and we so low; so glorious and we so inglorious; so great and we so small; so strong and we so weak, that we, too, feel this desire for some mediation between him and us.

Christ answers that need. He was the priest that the world demanded, that could enter into the holy of holies, that could offer the sacrifice once for all, and our sins being removed can forever stand in that mysterious order of Melchizedek, as the priest-mediatory.

Since Jesus made the way clear, I need no priest to do my confessing. I do my own confessing. I need no priest to grant me absolution. I get my own absolution directly through the mediation of Jesus Christ. I need no priest to do my praying. I do my own praying, coming boldly, though humbly to the throne of grace through him who loved me and gave himself for me. We are free citizens in Christ, and, through him, have drawn near to God; and in God live and move and have our being.

Jesus taught us that we need no hierarchy to stand between us and God. To him we owe the debt of gratitude for teaching us that true worship of God is not necessarily limited by time nor place, nor any assistance rendered us by any man; but hinges simply on the spirit of communion and the truth of attitude.

It takes the world a long time to learn this truth. We still want priests. We still desire to offer sacrifices and burnt offerings. We still venerate holy places and times, and stand in awe before the veils of holy of holies. Shall we never learn what Jesus taught, that not on Gerizim nor yet on Zion are men to worship; but in their hearts? Shall we never learn that it is not the number of meetings we attend, services we sit in, classes we teach, offices we hold—however important all these may be—that will justify us with God; but it is the humble and the contrite heart?

There are still those who pin their faith to a man—a priest, some preacher or elder it may be—or to a group of men—a hierarchy, a church, a party in a church, it may be—and think that the Good Father has especially endowed them to stand between Him and us. Throw off all priesthoods of whatever sort or whatever name and do your own worshiping, communing directly with the Father through the One who is forever priest after the order of Melchizedek.

A NEW MUSIC BOOK

Popular Hymns No. 2

THE ruling purpose of the author has been to give to the public a worthy successor of Popular Hymns. He has not sought to duplicate it, but to make a book as well adapted to the new methods of Church, Sunday-school and C. E. work as the first was to the conditions twenty years ago when Popular Hymns was launched upon its long and useful career. Popular Hymns No. 2 is better than its predecessor, not because it contains better music, but because the music is better adapted to the present wants of all the working forces of the army of the Lord.

EVANGELISTS will find the Gospel Proclamation in Song a department of the book eminently suited to every phase of a successfully conducted revival.

CHORISTERS will find the average choir supplied with a rich selection of beautiful and impressive solos with choruses, duets, quartettes, invocations and doxologies specially selected for the distinctive part a choir is expected to take in the service.

PASTORS who are responsible for the kind of pasture upon which the sheep and lambs are fed, will NOT find a sentiment out of harmony with New Testament Christianity. He will find it a companion vade mecum for his pocket Testament, containing gems for public worship, for the prayer-meeting, for funeral occasions, for Baptismal, Thanksgiving and Convention services. He will find that an expensive hymnal will not be needed unless it be to keep in the style.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVORERS will find in Popular Hymns No 2 all that they can wish, because it is full from back to back with soul-stirring sentiment set to soul-inspiring music, the only kind C. E's care to sing. The Solos, Duets, and Quartettes may be impressively used to enrich every session of the Society.

S. S. SUPERINTENDENTS who believe the Sunday-school should be the nursery of the church, the church at work saving the young, will find Popular Hymns No. 2 richly supplied with music within the voice compass and heart reach of the children, giving them a desire to remain and participate in the song service of the church. Like its predecessor,

It is an ALL ROUND BOOK

Club Rates Withdrawn.

On another page of this issue we announce the withdrawal of our club rates to churches Up to the close of business on April 3, we will continue to receive clubs of ten at the rate of One Dollar and twenty-five cents and clubs of twenty-five at the rate of One Dollar. These rates are made to churches which take the responsibility of forming clubs without expense to us. Even with this provision it must be apparent to every careful reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST that the paper is published at a loss, at these prices.

The club rates were made at the earnest solicitation of friends of good literature, who desired to use these exceedingly low prices as a means of interesting their brethren, knowing that if they could be induced to read the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for a year, they would appreciate its helpfulness and recognize that it more than justified the expenditure of One Dollar and Fifty Cents a year. We believe that the logic of this view is sound. Thousands have been added to our list of readers who, we are assured, recognize the fact that they have been receiving the paper during the past year for less than it has cost us to publish it and who will gladly pay a fair subscription price in order that they may have a part in maintaining a journal of the first order of excellence. When the club rates were announced, many of our brethren who are interested in the steady improvement of our religious literature, remonstrated with us because they feared that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST might be contemplating a change of its oft announced purpose of furnishing a steadily improving journal to the brotherhood and that they might expect indications of such economies in its publication as might render it profitable at the price of One Dollar a year. We reassured them on this point and we believe that the evidences furnished by our pages during the past year and for the few months of the present year, have dissipated any doubts in their minds that we wavered, even in the slightest degree, from our motto, "The best cause deserves the best advocate." On the contrary, our arrangements for the present year have been made with the intention of furnishing to our readers the very best reading matter obtainable, even at a largely increased cost. That we are succeeding in this attempt is the deliberate judgment of those well qualified to judge and is testified to by our increasing circulation. Comparison with any of the Two Dollar and Two Dollar and Fifty cent journals will readily convince any one that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST stands in the very front rank of religious papers, although from fifty cents to One Dollar cheaper in subscription price.

We trust that every one of our friends will renew and redouble their interest in the success of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and feel that they are, each and every one, invited to use their influence in extending its list of subscribers. In order to stimulate prompt and energetic effort we will offer to send the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST from April 1, 1901, to Jan. 1, 1902, to new subscribers for only One Dollar. Each subscriber sending us Three Dollars for three such subscriptions will receive as a premium a CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST Binder, made especially for this paper, and suitable for filing fifty-two copies, or, if they prefer, may select from our catalogue any one of our One Dollar books.

Sweeney and Tyler about the year 1860, was made an elder in the congregation in 1872 and served it faithfully up to the time of his death, Jan. 16. Bro. Carter was loved and honored by everyone who knew him, as an earnest, faithful Christian, devoted to every good work. W. S. SMITH.

GIDDENS.

Charles Melvin Giddens was born March 31, 1880, in Adair county, Kentucky. Died Feb. 14, 1901, at Douglass, Kan. Death was caused by a falling limb from a tree which he was felling and was almost instantaneous. He was the eldest son of T. J. Giddens, a former pastor of the church at Douglass, and Alice T. Giddens. He was married Dec. 23, 1899, to Miss Chloe Graves. His father says he was never known to tell an untruth. He obeyed the gospel at Dublin, Texas, under the preaching of Bro. J. B. Boen. He leaves a father, mother, four brothers, a devoted wife and an infant baby girl to mourn his departure.

C. W. YARD, pastor.

Three children, a mother, five sisters, four brothers and the husband remain to mourn their loss. The writer was called to preach the funeral sermon, Friday, Feb. 15, 1901. Deceased will be greatly missed, as she was a loving daughter, a gentle wife and devoted mother. D. F. SEYSTER.

Pine Creek, Ill., Feb. 20, 1901.

LONG.

After a short illness Sister Lillian R. Long died at Boydsville, Mo., Feb. 10, 1901, aged 15 years and 9 months. At a meeting held by the writer, she confessed her faith in Christ, Nov. 25, 1899. She was organist at the Christian Church at Boydsville. The night of her confession she arose from the organ stool with the determination of a woman and came forward leading nine others to Christ. I now hold between my fingers, attached to my watch chain, a gold friendship heart bearing the initial letters of her name; of this I'm proud, for it represents a sweet and tender heart and a life as pure as the driven snow.

J. W. COGGINS.

OTT.

Died, Feb. 10, at his home in Council Bluffs, Bro. Henry Ott. Bro. Ott was born in Germany, July 26, 1836, emigrated to America in 1850, and was married to Miss Catherine Moss, Nov. 11, 1860. This union has been blessed with nine children, seven of whom remain. In 1861, Bro. Ott enlisted as a soldier in the Union army. In 1896 he accepted Christ, and in his service he remained until death. His funeral was held at the Christian church—a tribute of love and sympathy with the grief-stricken wife, "Mother" Fife, sons and daughter which were present, but one was away, a member of the U. S. Navy.

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

"If you could only be here this winter morning and see for yourself you would no longer doubt me. Roses are blooming in our front yard and all nature is as far advanced in this lovely American summer-land as it will be in your cold eastern home by June.

Book Notes.

Thirty-five tracts and pamphlets for One Dollar is an attractive offer, especially when it is remembered that among the thirty-five are many pamphlets of thirty and forty pages. The man who wants to get the largest amount of reading matter, and good reading matter at that, for his money, cannot do better than to take advantage of this offer. We cannot take space to give a list of the titles of the thirty-five, but they are selected from the list given in our General Catalogue.

The Wondrous Works of Christ, by Dr. A. A. Willits, is a charming volume. It is a graphic presentation of the miracles wrought by Jesus during his earthly ministry. The New Testament narratives of these miracles are amplified and enlarged upon, circumstances and surroundings are given until the reader seems to stand in Judea, a spectator of the "wondrous works." The volume contains 226 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, stamped in gilt, and is illustrated with 68 engravings. It is a one-dollar book, which we are selling for Fifty Cents, postpaid.

If you have not read Shem, by Breckenridge Ellis, you have missed a good thing. The historical romance is the thing, just now. The popular novels of the last two years have been "Richard Carvel," "Janice Meredith," "When Knighthood Was in Flower," etc. Mr. Ellis has gone further back in history for the scene and characters of his story than the authors of any of the books named. Shem is a tale of the captivity of Israel, six hundred years before Christ. It contains, as the historical romance should, the clash of arms and the whisperings of love. If you have not already purchased Shem, send for it at once; you will be delighted with the story. Price, Fifty Cents.

What is Your Life? by W. J. Russell, promises to be one of the most popular books of the year. There are very few writers or speaker who have the happy faculty of making moral advice and ethical instruction palatable to young people, but among these few Mr. Russell stands pre eminent. What is Your Life? contains much valuable instruction to those who wish to make the most possible out of their lives, and at the same time it is so lively, interesting and entertaining that even the most thoughtless and frivolous young man or woman cannot help reading it, if it is once begun, and absorbing the instruction and benefit which it is intended to impart. It is just the volume for parents to place in the hands of their children. It is a beautiful, cloth-bound volume of 316 pages, price One Dollar.

The recent defeat of the Christian Scientists in their attempt to influence legislation by the Missouri legislature has served to awaken renewed interest in this strange sect and its wild doctrines. If you wish to have an intelligent understanding of Christian Science and an appreciation of its folly and foolishness, send for a copy of Christian Science Dissected, by A. D. Sector. In this booklet no time or space is wasted in circumlocution. The author goes right to the point, using plain language and demonstrating, beyond question, both the foolishness and sinfulness of Christian Science. Christian Science Dissected is the only book on this subject which has been issued by any of our publishing houses. Price, Twenty-five Cents.

March is the month which we devote to the cause of Foreign Missions. If you seek instruction or information on this subject, or if you are in need of material to assist you in preparing a sermon or address on missions, you cannot do better than to secure Missionary Addresses by A. McLean, Corresponding Secretary of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. Mr. McLean probably knows more about Foreign Missions than any other man among the Disciples of Christ. His book contains fourteen addresses on missionary themes, making a book of 298 pages, cloth-bound, which we sell for Sixty Cents.

Epworth League Convention, San Francisco, July 18-21, 1901.

At a meeting of the Trans-Continental Passenger Association held in Chicago, February 18, 19, 1901, the following resolutions were adopted affecting the Epworth League meeting, San Francisco, July 18-21, 1901:

RESOLVED:

1. That advertising contracts should be confined to the usual arrangements with legitimate newspapers and the transportation given in exchange must be furnished only to bona fide representatives of papers.

2. Itinerary or special advertising: In such cases in which such is necessary, no cash shall be paid organizer of party to cover cost of such printing, but the initial Trans-Continental line may print same, arranging with lines in interest upon the division of the actual cost of printing.

3. Compensation for leaders: No salary, commission or other form of compensation shall be paid for services in working up parties. No hotel bills, meals en route, sleeping-car fare or other personal expenses shall be paid.

4. No free or reduced rate transportation or concessions of any character shall be given in connection with Epworth League traffic. If any arrangements have been made which are in conflict with the above, it is the distinct understanding that such arrangements shall be at once cancelled.

RESOLVED:

That the Chairman hand a copy of the agreement adopted at to-day's session, in regard to concessions on Epworth League business, to the President or Secretary of the National organization and explain to him that in view of the fact that the railroads have made an exceedingly low rate for their excursion and have adopted this resolution in the interest of fairness to all railroad companies, that said national officers are requested to furnish copies of it to all state transportation committees and others who have to do with the selection of official routes, with the request that they observe the spirit of these resolutions by not soliciting or accepting favors from the railroads.

East London.

'Twas August, and the fierce sun overhead
Smote on the squalid streets of Bethnal Green,
And the pale weaver, through his windows seen
In Spitalfields, looked thrice dispirited.

I met a preacher there I knew, and said:
"Ill and o'erworked, how fare you in this scene?"
"Bravely!" said he, "for I of late have been Much cheered with thoughts of Christ, the living bread."

O human soul! As long as thou canst so
Set up a mark of everlasting light,
Above the howling senses' ebb and flow,

To cheer thee and to right thee if thou roam—
Not with lost toil thou laborest through the night!
Thou mak'st the heaven thou hop'st indeed thy home.

WHAT WE STAND FOR

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

"Bells of Easter-Tide"

A Beautiful New Concert Service For Easter Sunday . . . . . .

It is now only a short time until Easter Sunday. It is time to prepare for any special service which your Sunday-school will have upon that occasion. Do not wait until the last moment, but begin in time. Easter Day should be made beautiful with music and flowers.

"Bells of Easter-Tide" is a concert service, including music, recitations and appropriate selections from the Scriptures. The songs are by W. J. King and W. E. M. Hackleman. The poems and recitations are the work of Birdie Bell, E. E. Hewitt and Jennie Wilson. Both the authors and composers have done their work excellently.

"Bells of Easter-Tide" makes a pamphlet of sixteen pages, with a handsomely designed Easter cover. The price for single copy is five cents; per dozen, fifty cents, postpaid. Send the publishers five cents at once for a sample copy.

Once again, let us warn all our Sunday-school friends that the time is short. Easter Sunday comes on April 7, or in about four weeks from the present time. Not a day should be lost. "Bells of Easter-Tide" is not a difficult exercise, but time and careful preparation are required to satisfactorily present the simplest service.

SINGLE COPIES, 5 CENTS; PER DOZEN, 50 CENTS.

Current Events.

Pacification in the Philippines. Just before inauguration day Mr. Taft of the Philippine Commission cabled an informal report of the present conditions in the islands. It was not a vague burst of enthusiasm and congratulation, but dealt with facts and figures. Since January 1, 1,125 firearms have been captured and 1,368 surrendered. Since last November 5,000 bolomen have surrendered in Iloilo, 1,000 in Albay and Camarines and 60,000 residents of Panay have taken the oath of allegiance. The insurgent leader, Delgado, in Panay has surrendered with 350 men and rifles and two leaders in Bulacan with 200 men. Many of the leaders have made overtures for surrender but demand immunity from prosecution for any alleged complicity in assassinations. The failure of the American authorities to concede this point has caused delay in the surrender. General Trias, the Filipino leader in the southern provinces, has promised to surrender within fifteen days. Negotiations are in progress for a general surrender in Cebu. The Federal party among the Filipinos, which stands for the recognition of American sovereignty and the establishment of civil liberty, is gaining ground. Within the last three weeks the commission has organized five provincial governments, everywhere meeting and explaining to the chief men among the natives the provisions which have been made. In several cases natives have been appointed as provincial governors. The members of the commission started last week from Manila on a cruise among the islands and will spend several weeks visiting all the important ports. A draft of the new Philippine tariff schedule as proposed by the commission has been received at the War Department.

The Treaty Rejected. After a delay of several months, Great Britain has returned without approval the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as amended by the Senate. Our State Department is in complete agreement with the British Foreign Office in holding that the Nicaraguan Canal, if constructed, should be held as neutral, and the original treaty embodies this opinion. The Senate, however, by its amendments completely altered the purport of the treaty so as to provide for the control of the canal by the United States. The rejection of this treaty brings about a diplomatic deadlock, not so much between the State Department and the Foreign Office as between the State Department and the Senate. In the extra session of the Senate which has just been held, Senator Morgan advocated a resolution abrogating the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and thus denying Great Britain's right to be consulted about the matter at all. It is not at all improbable that something of this sort will be done at the next session of Congress. The abrogation of the treaty, which Great Britain still considers in full force, may be a somewhat brusque and undiplomatic proceeding, but it is right on the main issue. We need the canal and sooner or later must build it and control it. If Great Britain will not make a treaty with us to that end, we must build the canal without a treaty. Secretary Hay considers the diplomatic deadlock to be absolute and sees no use in trying to negotiate a new treaty. Anything which the Senate would agree to would be rejected by Great Britain. So much the more reason for proceeding without a treaty.

Cuban Perversity. The Cuban Constitutional Convention still hangs fire—unwilling to accept the conditions imposed by the Platt amendment, representing the views of the administration; wisely (or timorously) hesitating to precipitate a positive breach with the United States; and unable to adjourn without taking one course or the other. There is a party in Cuba whose recklessness is equal to its ingratitude in that it would not hesitate to force the United States into war to maintain its own theory of independence. Such a course would be the best possible demonstration of unfitness for self-government without a guardian. There is apparently an element in the Convention which thinks that if action on the question of relations with the United States is postponed long enough it will force an extra session of Congress to offer other and more agreeable terms. It is needless to state that this expectation is wholly fatuous. Reports from Gen. Wood indicate an increasing probability that the Cubans will yield and accept the conditions stated in the Platt resolution. (See CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, Feb. 28.) At least it is believed that there is no longer danger of an immediate adjournment sine die leaving the question unsettled.

The Second Term. Mr. McKinley has been called upon to guide the ship of state through sufficiently troubled waters during his first administration. How successfully or unsuccessfully he has accomplished his difficult task, let each judge for himself—in so far as party bias, one way or the other, leaves room for independent judgment. But it is not likely that the administration which has just opened will be easier or more restful for the chief executive than the one which has just closed. The second term is always a time of trouble. The President, seeing before him nothing but honorable retirement, has no more ambitions to gratify and does not need political friends. He expects nothing; he wants nothing; therefore he becomes independent of the party leaders with whose assistance he could not hitherto to dispense. However independent a President may have been in his first term, he is pretty sure to be more so in the second. He thinks more of being President of the whole country than of being the high man of his party, and the party does not like it. Moreover the second-term President has two sets of friends who make conflicting claims upon his power of appointment. The friends of his first campaign cannot be ruthlessly ejected from the offices which they have enjoyed for four years, and the friends of the second campaign cannot be suitably provided for unless some vacancies are made. As a result of these two elements, dissatisfaction arises. The President is less loved by his own party, with no compensating increase of popularity among his political opponents. Party discipline goes to pieces and the third-term question settles itself without the need of legislation or constitutional amendment.

Russia in Manchuria. Considerable official uncertainty seems to prevail in regard to Russia's new step in Asia, but the common knowledge of Russia's habitual course in the extension of her empire removes most of the mystery. While the Chinese envoys and the European ministers have been dickering about punishments and indemnities in Pekin, Russia has been privately negotiating a separate treaty through the Chinese representative in St. Petersburg, by which she has gained practically complete control of a territory which, if laid on the map of Europe, would almost cover France and Germany. There are magnificent distances in Asia and magnificent are the strides by which Russia is covering them. The treaty provides that there shall be a Russian commander in each province of Manchuria to whom the Chinese governor shall be subordinate; that the privilege of building railroads there shall be surrendered to Russia; that all mining rights shall belong to Russia; and that Russia shall enjoy special commercial privileges. It is maintained in St. Petersburg that no permanent occupation of Manchuria is intended, but if the Czar has ever before gotten so good a grip on a territory only to let it go, the incident has escaped the records. Great Britain is especially exercised over the matter and it was reported that our State Department had filed due protest, but the latter is officially denied. The warning issued to China on Feb. 16 against conceding territory to any power still holds good but cannot, of course, apply in this case so long as the Czar's assurance that he does not intend permanent occupancy is accepted.

Unconditional Surrender. If Gen. Kitchener, who is trying as hard as he can to negotiate peace terms with Gen. Botha, is still insisting on unconditional surrender, as the reports somewhat vaguely indicate, he is exhibiting less sagacity in making peace than he has shown in making war. Although no particulars can be obtained accurate enough to be worth publishing, it is no longer doubtful that Kitchener and Botha are carrying on negotiations. Sir Alfred Milner, who is said to be a famous negotiator, has gone to Pretoria to assist. But however great may be his technical skill, the Boers distrust him so thoroughly that he will probably be no great help. It is reported that the largest chance of failure of the negotiations lies in the demand of the burghers for allowance to restock their farms. De Wet and Steyn and the Cape Dutch who, being British subjects, revolted, are said to be excluded from any terms of amnesty. Botha apparently is willing to make terms and quit, but there is considerable doubt whether ,in the event of his surrender, he can control De Wet and Delarey. He is "commanding general," but those uncompromising fighters may consider that by making terms with the British he virtually resigns his command over the Boers. De Wet is still headed north and, being now back in his own country, will be harder to deal with than ever, but Col. Plummer is still pursuing him.

The Department of Agriculture. The Department of Agriculture works all the year round, but it is in the spring that the farmer's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of free seed to be distributed by his congressman. The appropriation this year for the distribution of seed is $170,000. We have long had doubts as to the wisdom of this free seed arrangement, but at any rate it is the smallest part of the work done by the Department. It is surprising to learn to what a degree our staple agricultural products have been altered by the importation of varieties which are not indigenous to our soil. This has been done in the case of almost all of our great crops. The Department is now studying the rice question and has successfully introduced the Japanese variety in place of the Honduran which did not prove very profitable. Secretary Wilson prophesies that, by crossing the Japanese citrus trifoliata with the Florida orange, a tree will be produced which will bear good fruit and thrive in the temperate zone. It is now being tried in the garden at Washington. Swedish barley, Egyptian cotton and Bavarian hops, all of which are claimed to be better than the corresponding American plants, are being tested at the experiment stations. Every state in the Union, including Alaska, has its own experiment station and garden for the testing of these and other importations. The Secretary of Agriculture says that the improvement of country roads is one of the most important features of the work of his department. The entire country has been divided into six districts which will be studied by experts to determine the kind of road-making most available and desirable for each district. The total annual appropriation for the Department of Agriculture is not more than enough to pay the running expenses of a first-class war for half a week, but no one can doubt that the $4,000,000 expended in this way is money well spent in education of a practical sort.

Slavery in South Carolina. A shocking state of affairs was discovered a few days ago in connection with the contract system which is applied to criminals in South Carolina. The system itself is easily subject to abuse, but in this case the abuses were such that it amounted virtually to slavery. Not only were convicted criminals hired out by contract to men who worked and guarded them with lash and hound, but some were farmed out pending their trial. Others, who had no connection whatever with the courts and were charged with no crime, had been kidnapped and worked, loaded with ball and chain and under guard, the general supposition being that they were criminals working under contract with the state. The revelations were made in the course of an investigation by a grand jury which has brought indictments against twenty farmers and overseers who are said to be guilty of these and similiar villainies.

Recent Discoveries in Egypt. Some important archeological finds have been made during the past year by Prof. Flinders Petrie Edwards, of University College, London, who has been delving in the tombs of the Egyptian kings of the first dynasty. His discoveries reach back to the period when the Egyptians were just learning to write, and the Egyptologist can now trace the development from the crude and early picture-writing, comparable to that of the American Indians, to the skillfully drawn hieroglyphics which constituted a genuine written language and continued to be used without substantial alteration for thousands of years. Among the most striking of the discoveries are the toilet articles and finely wrought jewelry of Menes, who is believed to have been the founder of the monarchy, the first king of the first dynasty, 6,500 years ago. These articles are in gold, ivory, turquoise and amethyst, dating from the very beginning of the Egyptian kingdom, and occupy a place in the history of Egypt similar to that occupied in Greek history by the gold ornaments found in the tombs at Mycæne and those discovered by Dr. Schlieman on the site of ancient Troy. The latter seem to date from the dawn of history but the Egyptian relics were as old at the time of the Trojan War as the jewelry of Troy is now.

Trusts and Imperialism. President Hadley of Yale delivered an address in the old South Church at Boston last Sunday on "The Development of a Public Conscience." The most pressing problem of the present day is that of trusts, and this problem is to be solved by the education of a public conscience. What is required is that not merely a fraction of the people, who are particularly interested in opposing this or that combination, shall be stirred to action, but that the whole body of American citizens, irrespective of private interests pro or con, shall be willing to submit to the necessary restrictions. If the community is not governed by this principle, the only alternative is "an emperor in Washington within twenty-five years."

Brevities. After a six days' special session, the Senate adjourned March 9. No work was done except the confirmation of executive appointments. The promotions of Sampson and Schley are not confirmed.

The wholesale dealers of St. Louis are at present enjoying a harvest. The retail dealers from the west and south are here by platoons and battalions and one is made to realize that St. Louis is a great wholesale market.

In spite of protests and Russian retaliation, Secretary Gage sticks to his interpretation of the Russian bounty on sugar and maintains the countervailing duty. A test case will be taken to the courts by those interested.

Ex-President Benjamin Harrison is reported seriously ill with grippe which has a tendency in his case to run into pneumonia. His friends are much alarmed about his condition though the doctors maintain that he will recover.

A new Spanish cabinet has been organized. The fall of a ministry there is a small thing, but the whole situation is shaky, owing to the unpopularity of the Queen Regent who is a foreigner (Austrian) and the sickly condition of the King.

As expected, George W. Parker was nominated for mayor of St. Louis at the Republican primaries on Tuesday of last week. He carried 25 out of 28 wards and the popular vote was four to one in his favor as against his nearest competitor, Judge Zachritz.

Kaiser William was wounded in the face by a missile while riding in a carriage one day last week. The wound proved to be quite severe. The popular sympathy toward him which this has aroused more than outweighs the ill-feeling caused by his recent friendly attitude toward England.

It is rumored that the British government meditates placing an import duty upon sugar as a means of raising much-needed revenue. The sugar refining industry has in recent years almost disappeared in England. The levying of this duty would be a striking departure from her traditional free-trade policy.

A number of Greek statues have been found by sponge divers under water off the island of Anticythera. It is supposed that the ship which carried them was wrecked at this dangerous point in going from Athens to Rome, and it may be that this is the famous shipwreck of a cargo of art treasures to which Lucian referred as a national calamity.

Polygamy is encourged by a bill recently passed by the Utah legislature which, while it does not legalize the practice, debars any outsider from entering complaint against any person on this charge. The bill was supported by a solid vote of the Mormon members, acting under orders, and was unanimously opposed by the Gentiles.

A franchise tax bill has been passed by the Missouri Legislature after much stir and effort. The tax of franchises is a straightforward, sensible, business proposition and one might have expected to see it adopted with less ranting and less of the air of conscious virtue. Several states in the east, where the money kings are supposed to hold sway, already have similar laws.

Regenerative Force of Emotional Sincerity.

It has been a long time since we read anything more interesting and thrilling and deeply suggestive than George Kennan's account, in a recent number of the Outlook, of Jerry McAuley's prayer-meeting on the Bowery in New York City. It was back in the late seventies when Jerry was in the prime of his marvelous power. The Bowery is the foulest hell in the slumdom of New York, and the prayer-meeting was held in the worst street of it—"next door to Kit Burns' rat pit." Jerry McAuley was a converted convict and jail bird from Sing Sing. A most unpromising combination for the most wonderful prayer-meeting ever held on the American continent.

Mr. Kennan testifies that the extraordinary wave of regenerating influence that swept through the meeting, and its results from night to night, beggar description. No effort was made to create excitement and none existed, but the tidal current of mighty influence that rolled through the dingy hall brought thugs and thieves and harlots and drunkards and the blackest imps from the pit to their feet, with streaming eyes and quivering lips confessing their sins, laying bare their blackened souls, imploring Almighty God and the good people present to help them lead a better life. Mr. Kennan's own previously avowed skepticism and indifference were swept away and he found himself so deeply engrossed in the proceedings that he lost all consciousness of time.

In accounting for the wonderful power of that service he says: "Every man who took part in that prayer-meeting was stirred with emotion to the very bottom of his heart; and he spoke not only with frankness, but with the fiercest, most impassioned sincerity." "For the first time in my life," says Mr. K., "I saw human souls naked; and if there be anything more interesting on this round globe of ours than the self-revelation of a human being who has forgotten all conventionalities, abandoned all pretenses and lost all self-consciousness in a fiery, passionate impulse to do right and speak the truth, I have yet to discover it."

Now the phenomenal power of that great prayer-meeting was that same "fiercest, impassioned sincerity," that emotional intensity and earnestness and searching honesty that went to the very bottom of the soul. Sincerity deep enough and real enough to be intense, earnest and enthusiastic is the greatest power on earth to move men, and this power usually belongs to men who have been redeemed from the lowest degradation of a life of sin. The most remarkable phenomenon in the history of Christianity has been the passion for souls, the enthusiasm of humanity, emotion set on fire by the love of God to bring men to the cross of Christ. St. Augustine, St. Francis of Assisi and Jerry McAuley are instances in which this passion burned with fiercest flame.

It was said of the Master himself: "The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up," and when he went about the country absorbed in the enthusiasm of humanity, filled with a passionate longing for the salvation of men, his family, who would have agreed with Lord Melbourne when he said: "If we must have a religion let us have one cool and indifferent like the one we already have," thought their illustrious kinsman and the Master of us all was crazy. They declared he was beside himself as George Kennan thought Jerry McAuley was when he went into that prayer-meeting; but he thought himself a fool for his skepticism and indifference when he came out.

To this deep sense of reality and impassioned sincerity but one contrary note was struck during Mr. Kennan's visits to the Water street prayer-meeting. We give the incident in his own words:

"One evening, about a fortnight after my first visit to the Water street mission, two decently dressed young men who came together and sat together, but who were strangers to both Metcalf and me, rose, one after the other, and spoke. There was nothing to which I could fairly take exception in what they said, and, judged by the conventional, ecclesiastical standard, it might have been regarded as both pertinent and pious. But in that atmosphere it did not ring true; and turning to Metcalf I whispered: 'That's the first insincere note I've ever heard in this prayer-meeting.' 'Hold on a minute,' he replied, 'wait till you hear what Jerry says to them.' When the second of the young men finished narrating his religious experience by declaring in a sanctimonious way that he knew he was 'washed white in the blood of the Lamb,' Jerry rose at his little desk and said quietly: 'If you want to get religion and follow Christ, feel honestly and speak the truth. God hates shams.' At once everybody seemed to breathe more freely, as if the rebuke had cleared the whole spiritual atmosphere; and M., leaning toward me, whispered: 'What did I tell you! I knew Jerry'd spot 'em.' 'Yes,' I replied, 'he spotted 'em all right; but what a bombshell that admonition would be in some church prayer-meetings that we know of! It would put a stop to the exercises.' 'It won't stop 'em here,' M. replied confidently, 'but it'll discourage make-believes. I tell you, nothing goes in this prayer-meeting unless it's straight.' And nothing did."

The straightness of the meeting was its tone of reality, its note of sincerity, its vivid consciousness of the saving presence and power of Jesus Christ. The psychological explanation of the phenomena of the Jerry McAuley Water street mission, the abundant fruit of which remains to bless the metropolis, is not to be found in animal magnetism or in the hypnotism of a certain type of evangelism, or in the clever manipulation of men, but in the fierce, impassioned sincerity of men who have been actually redeemed from the wretchedness and misery of sin, whose moral conviction and intense spiritual passion breaks up the great deeps of the soul and brings it black and bare before God and before itself, begetting in its inmost recesses a burning consciousness of the need of salvation. If there be any hypnotism in such influence as this, it is not animal magnetism, but spiritual. It is the contagion of moral and religious earnestness.

The lesson of this remarkable mission conducted by a man of remarkable power, if well learned, would regenerate the church prayer-meetings of the country and make them the means of regenerating those who attend them.

In some quarters there seems to be a revival of criticism of Uncle Tom's Cabin and its author. Mrs. Stowe has been accused of ignorance and malicious misrepresentation of the south. Her critics assume that she represents every slave-holder as a villain of the type of Lagree. The fact is that the strong point of the book is that it gives full recognition to the amiable qualities of many slave-holders such as Tom's first owner and St. John, but shows how helpless they were under a vicious system to prevent evils which they themselves deeply regretted. One of our most brilliant essayists, a woman who delights in getting from every book the opposite impression to that which its author intended, declares that the reading of Uncle Tom's Cabin quite converted her to the opinion that slavery was a beneficent institution. The life of the slaves on the plantation in Kentucky was so happy that she thought the system which produced it must be good.

We are now in the midst of a period observed by a large part of the Christian world as a special season of fasting and prayer in memory of the closing days of our Savior's earthly life. There is much folly, ostentation and even hypocrisy, to be sure, in many of the observances of Lent, but a proper observance might be helpful, and in many cases is helpful, to the religious life. It is meant to be a period of spiritual revival and surely it is as legitimate and scriptural to have an annual season of special effort for spiritual growth as to have a special evangelistic effort for numerical growth, as most of our churches do about once a year. Let us have no popery and no superstitious dependence upon mere abstinence from meat for our spiritual welfare, but let us have occasionally a special season of spiritual refreshing. And if we can have it most conveniently and effectively at the same time that the rest of the Christian world is trying in a different way to do the same thing, why not then?

A Presbyterian paper expresses the belief that the Christian Endeavor Society is "going to seed" because the religious bodies most numerously represented in it, after the Presbyterians, are the Congregational and the "Campbellist," of which the former exhibits a strong tendency toward Christian union and the latter openly advocates it. In spite of Dr. Clark's effort to keep the society interdenominational, it is becoming more and more undenominational. This tendency, says our contemporary, is "dangerous, if not fatal," and so the Society is "going to seed." Let it go, we say, if that is the kind of seed it is going to. The blossom of Christian Endeavor during these two decades of its history has been a beautiful and fragrant flower. But the main point is not the blossom, but the crop. Let Christian Endeavor go to seed if it will, and from that seed of charity and brotherly love and interdenominational fellowship and disappearing prejudice, what a crop may spring up of true Christian unity—the unity of the Spirit in the bonds of peace! And this result will indeed be "dangerous if not fatal" to several things which have been long in dying, and ought long ago to have been dead.

We noticed recently that a writer in one of our papers gives "over-charitableness" as the reason for a tendency, which he thinks he observes among us, to fellowship other religious bodies. Does the brother seriously believe that charity is a thing which can be overdone? Must we modify the injunction to "love thy neighbor as thyself" by a foot-note giving warning against loving him too much? Must we add a codicil or a supplementary statement to the thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians explaining that, though the charity which suffereth long, is kind, envieth not, vaunteth not itself and is not provoked, is an excellent thing, yet we must guard against overdoing the matter, especially as regards our religious neighbors? There is, to be sure, a certain pseudo-charity which is mushiness or feebleness or laziness or anything but true charity, and very likely this is what the writer had in mind. But to ascribe to "over-charitableness" the tendency to compromise the truth, implies that the only hope of loyalty lies in maintaining a judicious and well-regulated hatred of the sects.

Hour of Prayer.

Sowing the Seed.

TEXT: In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand: for thou knowest not which shall prosper, whether this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good.—Eccl. 11:6.

There are no accidents in the providence of God. In spiritual things as well as in temporal, every effect has its cause and the cause is infallibly sure to produce the effect. Seed sown under right conditions will bring forth after its kind. All the efforts men make for the advancement of the kingdom, their teaching, preaching, living, are germinal; they contain harvests, which in due season ripen and are gathered.

Ignorance an Incentive.

The writer of Ecclesiastes is arguing that as we do not know the simplest facts, the way of the wind, the manner of growth in embryo, so we do not know "the work of God who doeth all." Therefore, "in the morning sow thy seed," etc. So far from our ignorance of what will prosper or how it will prosper deterring the full hand, it should encourage it in scattering. The work of God must be advanced. His knowlege must be spread abroad, until it fills the earth, as the waters the sea. He has wisely chosen the method for the expansion of His kingdom, and, leaving results to Him, we are to sow beside all waters; to sow, even though some seed falls on the highway, to be crushed and devoured, and some on stony soil, to wither away, and some to be choked by thorns. Since not all can prosper, let us sow the more bountifully, so as to be sure of some.

A Simple Part.

Though we are often disturbed and perplexed over Christian work, in its last analysis it is very simple. It is like sowing seed. In the parable as we have it in Luke, the sower's name is not mentioned; he is "a sower," no more. Nothing whatever is said about his family connections, his social position, or his equipment. But true to his task, he "went forth to sow." And here again we see the necessity of action. We must go forth; we cannot tarry in comfort, nor wait for the fields to come to us, but trusting in God for guidance, we must go forth. From nation to nation the sowers go; and from city to city, and from home to home, and from heart to heart. "And as ye go, preach, saying, the kingdom of God is at hand!" Now this is all a simple, not a complicated, task. Fill your hands with seed; then go, and scatter it, leaving the harvest with God.

Patience and Persistence.

Most people need to be comforted with the assurance that the harvest is certain, for they grow weary in well-doing. They forget that "in due season they shall reap, if they faint not." The very nature of plant growth is such that the husbandman must learn to wait. The seed sinks into the moist soil, and is lost to sight; it lies buried for days. And even when it finally sends up a tiny green banner as a sign of its life, there is yet a long time between that and the yellow gold of the abundant harvest. Good people, faithful servants of the Master, seem to confound seed with sickle. Be sure which it is the season demands and then be patient. Early and late, toil on. The criticisms of the foolish who find fault because there is no harvest in February need not trouble us. Wait. But patience is the complement of labor, not its substitute. When you have done your work (but not before) remember that "they also serve who only stand and wait."

The Increase from God.

"I planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase." This was no sentimental ascription of praise to God, but a devout acknowledgment by the chief apostle of his dependence on the all-bountiful Giver. Neither the passionate energy of Paul nor the flaming eloquence of Apollos could cover the vineyard of the Lord with the purple increase; that was left for the Master himself. Learn from this fact, first, the certainty of the harvest, and second, the comparative insignificance of human agency. God does not need man's wisdom; much less, man's ignorance; but whether wisdom or ignorance, He can work through the creature the accomplishment of His beneficent purpose. Are there gifted servants of God toiling in our midst? Let us praise, not them, but God, who gives both gifts and fruitage. On the other hand, are His servants slow and dull? Then let us praise Him that through the feeblest of instruments His infinite purpose can be achieved.

Prayer.

Valleys covered with corn and hills bearing vineyards and orchards proclaim Thy bounty, O God. The fruitful furrow is the work of infinite wisdom and exhaustless energy. May these sweet voices of nature encourage Thy servants as they go forth, bearing the word of life, the seed of the kingdom. In toil and tears may they be faithful, sowing alike beside the dark waters and the laughing waters and then come home at last, bringing their sheaves with them. To that glad hour may we all be guided by the great Husbandman, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

All is God's,
And my poor life is terribly sublime;
Where'er I look, I am alone in God,
As this round world is wrapt in folding space;
Behind, before, begins and ends in Him.
So all beginnings and all ends are hid;
And he is hid in me and I in him.

—George MacDonald.

Editor's Easy Chair.

Our last day at Daphne, Lord's day, March 3, was one of those rare days in which nature seems to combine the elements to make it ideal. It was such a day as makes one glad he is living, except he be an incorrigible pessimist. The sunshine lay warm and radiant on all the land and shimmered and smiled on the quiet waters of the bay. A gentle gulf breeze stirred the glossy leaves of the magnolias, swayed the branches of the tall pines, caused the long gray moss to oscillate like a pendulum, but with less regularity, and moderated the temperature just enough to prevent lassitude. The very birds caught the spirit of the day, and seemed to exhaust their repertoire of songs. Given such a day throughout the United States, the offering for foreign missions should have swelled into such proportions as would suggest the approach of the millennium. We trust it was a great offering, no matter what may have been the weather conditions elsewhere.

There was no preaching that day in the little village church. But we had a most delightful little meeting at the residence of Bro. Randall in the afternoon, for the "breaking of bread." There were a dozen and a half present, most of whom were of those who are accustomed to meet on the first day of the week for that purpose. The singing of several of the sweet old hymns, so laden with tender memories, the reading of appropriate Scriptures, prayer, brief remarks, thanksgiving, distribution and participation of emblems, "Blest be the tie that binds," and the benediction. What a season of refreshing it was from the presence of the Lord! Several present had not had the privilege of sitting at the Lord's table for a long time, and to them it was a feast indeed. But none seemed to enjoy it more than a few pious persons who joined with us, the customs of whose churches deny them this enjoyment except at long intervals. None of us, perhaps, realize fully how much of spiritual blessing may be drawn from the observance, in a proper spirit, of this memorial institution. Such was our last day in Daphne-on-the-bay.

On Monday morning early, we parted from the friends we had learned to love in quiet Daphne, and the little steamer "Jas. T. Carney" was carrying us across the bay to Mobile. Accompanying us were H. E. McMillin and wife, of Cleveland, with whom we regretfully parted at Mobile—they to go southwest to Texas, and we to the southeast to Florida. The "Old Reliable" L. & N., which took us to Mobile, brought us on via Pensacola to River Junction, where it put us in charge of the Seaboard Air Line without the slightest trouble to us. One of the marked features of modern railroad travel is the courtesy of officials and employees, who really seem to regard themselves as servants of the traveling public. We have never seen this exhibited in a more marked degree than by the employees of the L. & N. railway. The A. G. P. A. at Pensacola, J. W. Lurton, when we found we had overstayed the limits of our transportation, kindly offered to loan us money if we needed it in order to avoid detention. Could courtesy go further?

We reached Pensacola in time to go down to the bay and see the battleships "Alabama," "Massachusetts," and "Kearsage" riding at anchor in its beautiful harbor. They had been there a few weeks and were soon to leave. The navy yard at this place has undergone a great transformation since we visited it four years ago. It had been allowed to fall into decay, but the war with Spain for Cuba's liberation rejuvenated it, and the Commodore in charge, to whom we were introduced, reported it in fine condition, with all its machinery working by electric power. The city itself has made considerable improvement, for which much credit is given to the L. & N. Railroad. The next day brought us through De Funiak Springs, where a Southern Chautauqua is in progress across the beautiful Wabash, which "our special artist" photographed by a snapshot from her kodak as we dashed across the bridge over its clear waters and into Jacksonville, as the "shades of night" which were "falling fast" were being shot through with the first beams of a full rising moon.

Jacksonville's new union station, which first attracted our attention, we found to be only typical of the improvements which this gateway city to Florida has experienced in recent years. Its elegant hotels, all crowded with northern visitors, its splendid stores, all doing a lively business, its prosperous daily newspapers, "The Times-Union and Citizen," the morning paper, and "The Metropolis," a wide-awake, high-toned afternoon paper, the busy wharves along the St. Johns, all show that Florida in general and Jacksonville in particular are sharing in the general prosperity of the country. There was a time, not many years ago, when, if you saw a man in Florida really doing something in a businesslike way with vigor and apparent success, it was safe to ask him where he lived before he came to Florida. Now, not only are northern capital and energy assisting in the development of this region, but the natives have caught the same spirit. We are glad to learn that the churches are also enjoying a larger measure of success. The First Christian Church, with which we had the pleasure of meeting last night, at the midweek prayer-meeting, has experienced a great revival of interest under Bro. J. T. Boone's pastoral care. The church has recently purchased a lot on the southwest corner of St. James Square, the finest location for a church in the city. It has a large and prosperous Sunday-school. The prayer-meeting, led by Bro. Rufus A. Russell, business manager of the Metropolis, had for its subject the recent state convention held in that city, and the testimonials of the members as to the good they had received from it was a sufficient vindication of the wisdom of such conventions. We did not have time to meet Bro. Blenus, pastor of the Second Christian Church, which meets in a leased building at present. We hope to meet him and learn more of his work on our return trip. These closing lines are written on the train as we leave for a trip down the East Coast, of which the Easy Chair shall have something to say later on. Grace, mercy and peace to all our readers. We shall post this at the oldest city in the United States.

Questions and Answers.

In the C.-E. of January 17, in replying to a question by "Richard," you approved of the practice of infant dedication (as distinguished from infant baptism) as being "entirely in harmony with the spirit and teaching of Jesus." On page 111 of "Christian Baptism," Mr. Campbell condemns as popery the practice of a parent taking a "vow" for his child and then teaching his son that he is obliged to join his father's church because of that vow. Mr. Campbell also says that to "only dedicate them to God" is still worse, for "neither Moses nor the prophets nor Christ nor his apostles" approve such practice and "to speak of dedicating anything with a soul in it to the spiritual service of the Lord shocks all common sense." How can you reconcile your approval of infant dedication with these words of Campbell? O. D. M.

We do not know that we are under any obligation to reconcile anything that we have said with Mr. Campbell's utterances on the subject. His condemnation of the practice of taking a vow for the child does not touch us, for we never suggested it. The distinction which he makes between things and persons, in that the former can be dedicated to any given purpose, while the latter cannot, does not seem to us wholly sound. To dedicate means etymologically to give. Hannah said of her son Samuel, "I have granted him to the Lord" (1. Sam. 1:28). All things and all persons belong to God whether we grant or dedicate them to him or not. The most we can do is to recognize his ownership. When we dedicate a house we recognize that it is God's and agree to treat it as belonging to him; we do not take any vow on the part of the house. To dedicate a child is to recognize God's right to its life and service, and agree to treat it accordingly, i. e., to prepare it by training for his service. The training of a child is in its parents' hands, though it is not a chattel. There is no vowing for the child, no theory of substitutionary virtue or vicarious righteousness or other priestcraft or popery. If Mr. Campbell, in his proper zeal to combat infant baptism, included in his condemnation such a dedication as consists in an agreement on the part of the parents to train up the child in the fear of the Lord, we can only say that we decline to follow him in this opinion. We are not Campbellites, and feel quite at liberty to differ with him on many points with a clear conscience and a straight face.

1. What do you think of a pastor who refuses for thirteen months to call on one of the members of his congregation, having been requested four or five times to call for a special reason? The only reason given for not calling is that he did not wish to be dictated to.

2. Has a pastor a right to exchange pulpits without permission of the official board?

3. Is it right for a pastor to have pay entertainments in the church without the consent of the officers? Z. H. H.

1. The action of a pastor is certainly not to be commended who is unwilling to listen to any suggestions from members of his congregation, though it might be possible for him to have a reason for not calling as valid as the special reason for calling on this particular member. It would seem that a pastor might be expected to call on all of his members, unless the church is very large, within thirteen months, whether any one is specially pointed out to him or not.

2 and 3. In many congregations it is customary for the pastor to exchange pulpits with other ministers without asking permission, while other congregations have a "pulpit supply committee" to which all such matters are referred. In regard to entertainments in the church, it seems obvious that they should not be decided upon by the pastor in opposition to the wish of the officers. In general, any situation which calls for such close definition and specification of the mutual rights and privileges of pastor and official board, indicates that the desire to rule is too strongly present on one side or the other—and very likely on both.

Is it true that by admitting sprinkled persons to communion at the Lord's table we practically admit sprinkling as Christian baptism? A Brother.

No, it is not true. In so doing we admit only that the table is the Lord's and that he has not authorized us to exclude from it any one who, having examined himself, considers himself qualified to partake of the emblems.

How far is whatever tendency toward denominationalism which the Disciples of Christ may have, due to our willingness to compromise with a divided christendom? Theodore A. Johnson.

If "compromising with a divided christendom" means recognizing the Christian character of those who are not of our fold, we should say that this is a tendency which is opposed to denominationalism. If it means an acquiescence in the present divided condition of the church as its legitimate and permanent condition, it would represent not a tendency toward denominationalism, but the thing itself. It does not seem to us that there is exhibited among us any serious tendency toward the latter form of compromise. The Disciples of Christ and the religious world at large never had a stronger or healthier desire for union than at present, and this desire is based on a recognition of the evils of division.

It is stated in our local paper that a Hebrew talent of silver was equal to $618.50 and a talent of gold to $13,809. We usually see it stated that a talent of silver was about $1,600 or $1,800 and a talent of gold a great deal more. Which is correct? Mrs. J. A. Brown.

To begin with, the talent was not a coin or a sum of money, but a weight. In the earlier days of Hebrew history there was no coinage. The weight of a talent of gold was 108 pounds avoirdupois and a talent of silver about 96 pounds. The ratio of value between gold and silver was 13.3 to 1, but this was an inconvenient ratio for effecting exchange so the talent of gold was made enough heavier so that one talent of gold would be equivalent to fifteen talents of silver. The value of 108 pounds of gold, the weight of a talent, at the present day is approximately $30,000. The value of the talent of silver would therefore be one fifteenth of this or $2,000. One is apt to be misled by the fact that the ratio between gold and silver at the present day is not the same as it was in that early time. The exchange value of both have decreased, but that of silver to a much greater extent, so that the present ratio of gold and silver is nearer 30 to 1 than 15 to 1, and the present market value of 96 pounds of silver, the weight of a talent, would be only about $1,000. It will be readily seen that the question of the value of the silver talent is to be determined by finding what that amount of silver was worth then rather than what it is worth now. $2,000 is approximately correct.

The Permanent Contribution of the XIXth Century to English Literature

By Prof. William Lyon Phelps

II. NOVELISTS AND ESSAYISTS*

In fiction, the century has had also a glorious record. Novelists of the first rank in English literature are Scott, Jane Austen, Dickens, Thackeray, George Eliot and Stevenson. It looks now as if we should have to add the name of Thomas Hardy to this number. In the early years of the century, Sir Walter looms up as the giant figure. In spite of his careless style he remains the king of English romanticists. With the exception of "Henry Esmond," no English romances appeared to equal the best of his books until, toward the end of the period, another Scotchman charmed the world with his tales of the heather and the sea—Robert Louis Stevenson. The stories of this sprightly invalid, written with an art unknown to Scott, are still in the first flush of their fame. And the influence of their author, who began to produce when fiction was almost wholly given over to realism, has been and is mighty, as anyone may see by looking about him. He brought health and fresh air to the fetid chambers of realism; and succeeded so well by precept and example in compelling the world to give him a hearing, that at the dawn of the new century we are in imminent danger of being engulfed by a veritable flood of romance. Contemporary fiction resounds with the shouts of soldiers of fortune and the clash of swords. Surely, most of these stirring tales which are now selling by the hundred thousand, and proving gold-mines to author and publisher, are as ephemeral as the daily newspapers. They smell of mortality.

Dickens and Thackeray.

In fiction, Dickens and Thackeray are the twin giants of the Victorian age, as Tennyson and Browning are in poetry. Their reputation is apparently secure. It is true that a reaction against Dickens set in some time ago, which has not yet spent its force. But tried by the most cruel test of all, the test of time, which has taken away some of the glitter and tinsel from his name, we find the pure gold more bright than ever. His tendency to the falsely pathetic and to the melodramatic has repelled many readers of to-day from his books. But the common people heard him gladly. His abounding humor, his overflowing human sympathy, and his immortal caricatures show a vitality that age cannot wither nor custom stale. "Pickwick Papers," "David Copperfield," "Bleak House," can Time lessen the greatness of such mighty encyclopædias of life?

Thackeray's reputation has never been bitterly assailed in recent years like that of Dickens, possibly because the actual number of his readers was and is not nearly so large. Every passing year finds his name brighter; the circle of his admirers wider; and his position in English literature stronger. He may turn out to be our foremost writer of fiction. The charge of snobbery, made against his personal character so often in his lifetime, is now seen to have no foundation. His sympathy with humanity, though not so demonstratively expressed as that of Dickens, was fully as keen. The chief defect in his writings is that he is too much of a preacher. Like so many Englishmen he is not content to let his representations of life speak for themselves; he must step out of the role of narrator, in the most thrilling point in the drama, and don the preacher's vestments. This makes "The Newcomes," in spite of its death scene, irritating to many and in places almost unreadable. But at his best, Thackeray's art is impeccable. "Vanity Fair," with its unforgettable characters, and "Henry Esmond," the best historical romance in the language, are books that no other man could have written; and if anything can be said to be a permanent contribution to English literature, it is surely such works as these.

Jane Austen and George Eliot.

Jane Austen and George Eliot are the only woman novelists of the century who may be unhesitatingly assigned to the first class. Miss Austen in her time was as completely overshadowed by the mighty reputation of Walter Scott as her physical strength would have been by his robust masculine vigor. But she was one of those rare individuals who are content to work for the sake of the work alone. "Art for art's sake," a proverb as grievously mishandled as "Honi soit," is particularly applicable to the novels of this remarkable woman. She turned out masterpiece after masterpiece, seeking and finding no recognition, and working on that account with no less painstaking art. She took her pay, not in the downright cash of a contemporary reputation, but in drafts upon the future that must have seemed to her so much waste paper. But Time has redeemed and paid in full every one, and the end of the century finds her name very well up in the front rank of English novelists. George Eliot, who, with the possible exception of Mrs. Browning, was the most powerful feminine intellect among the English of the century, had the good fortune to see her books receive the acclaim that they richly deserved. Indeed, it seems true that to-day the number of her readers is not so great as it was in her declining years. This is a lamentable fact, probably due in part to the present rage for romanticism, and also because her career was something of an anti-climax. She drifted away from the highest standards of art toward dreary fields of philosophy and sociology, as though anything could be more serious than a great portrayal of life artistically and reverently done! Her best books were her first; as time goes by, "Scenes of Clerical Life," "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss" and "Silas Marner" stand out supreme; while "Daniel Deronda" is slowly falling under its own weight.

Thomas Hardy.

Hosts of other novels of the century might be mentioned if there were space. We are looking only at the foremost names. Among English novelists, Thomas Hardy stands easily first. His work during the last thirty years, always conscientious if sometimes mistaken, represents a level of excellence that none of his contemporaries, not even the erratic and brilliant Meredith, can equal. The rustic cackle of his bourg drowns the murmur of the world, which stops to hear the human comedy played, ever old and ever new, in incomparable Wessex. He is the great pessimist of our age, as Stevenson was its joyous optimist. But his pessimism is not the result of a mind out of tune nor is it flavored with the gall of the cynic. His pessimism rises from an almost abnormal sympathy with humanity. The depths of tenderness in this man are stirred by the spectacle of hideous suffering in which he imagines all persons but himself to live and move and have their being. He will, therefore, be the spokesman for humanity's pain. He will speak for the chained Prometheus, and call the world to witness its own sorrow and revise its creed of a loving Divinity. His pessimism then is sympathetic and temperamental: he cannot see life in any other way. But the shadow of his works is lightened by a sense of humor deliciously keen and true. His Shaksperian shepherds touch the springs of loving laughter in our hearts, and make an irresistible appeal by their unworldly harmlessness. Furthermore, his books are artistic wholes, living organisms, examples of what novels should be. Such a story as "The Return of the Native" is entirely beyond the power of most contemporary writers.

The Essayists: Carlyle.

In our review of the century we are purposely omitting everything but pure literature. Of historical, scientific, theological, political and religious writers there has been enough and to spare; we are confining ourselves to men of letters. Outside of the fields of poetry and the novel, the greatest figure of the century is unquestionably Thomas Carlyle. His influence was so mighty that even if there should be a public conflagration of every one of his books, his spirit would still be a potent force. For he impressed himself so deeply upon the men of the fifties and sixties that he has become a part of the inheritance of the later generations. His trumpet call to duty is still ringing in our ears; and our hearts are renewed within us as we remember his familiar watchwords. This grim prophet who looked upon the so-called progress of the age with gloomy eyes, might have seen some hope in the fact that the people of the very age he despised listened most eagerly to his teachings. The more violently he flogged them the more keenly they seemed to enjoy the scourge. And the reason for this is plain. Wholly apart from his tremendous force and power for righteousness, he was one of the greatest literary artists that England has ever produced. As a portrait painter his accuracy is thrilling; in depicting the grotesque he has no equal among the moderns; and his humor, always grim, is ever spontaneous and seizes us with contagious force. He is never dull, and to read him is a perpetual delight. In his oase the style was certainly the man; and he seems destined to rank in a place all by himself.

Ruskin and Macaulay.

Ruskin also spoke out loud and bold, but too often he was hoarse. He performed an inestimable service to his century by revealing the beauties and glories of art. He is still an inspiration to many, but his reputation is certainly not what it was. That no one was ever written down except by himself is as true now as on the day when it was first spoken; and the wild, incoherent ravings of Ruskin have not only raised a laugh among the unskillful, but have made the judicious grieve. Had Ruskin confined himself to matters on which he was an acknowleged master, he would stand out to-day in much clearer relief than he actually does. How different is the case of Charles Lamb! Without a tithe of Ruskin's moral earnestness he had such delightful amenity, such endless sympathy, and so delicate and pervasive a sense of humor that it is possible his works will be read with pleasure after Ruskin has become merely a name.

Landor's classic prose has a small but steady number of admirers, and some of his work must be regarded as a permanent contribution. However, it is possible that by another hundred years he will join the illustrious dead whose names are familiar to all students of literary history, but whom nobody reads. That is certainly the case with Southey, whose verse we did not mention in our review of the poets, simply because readers have decided to let him alone—a man who has a great fame, but no friends, not even an enemy. The gentle Leigh Hunt is also receding, but for a different reason; he is not dull, but faint. Many other once noted authors may be classed in one or the other of these groups.

Of the literary critics of the century, Coleridge seems to be the most subtle, and Matthew Arnold the most widely read. Macaulay's reputation sagged fearfully some twenty years ago, till it seemed that it was about to part in twain. Lately there has been a reaction in his favor, perhaps owing partly to the fact that he is so widely studied in American schools and colleges. And there are not many modern prose writers better worth studying for rhetorical purposes. The vigor of his style, its wonderfully spirited movement, his sound common sense and a certain wholesomeness will keep much of his work alive. He represents the typical educated Englishman, both in his strong qualities and in his prejudices; as we read him, he produces the peculiar illusion of being yet in the land of the living. Even after the lapse of nearly half a century it is difficult to imagine a man of such vital energy lying in the quiet grave.

The day before his death."

"Ay, could a man inquire
When it shall come!" I say.

What Most Interests Me Now

By J. S. Lamar

V. The Meaning of Coal

Some of my readers may be glad to learn that, with the present chapter, I expect to conclude my desultory notes, if I may so call them, upon the first volume of God's two great books. The subjects discussed are so intimately connected with much of the literature and thought of the age, and, withal, bear so directly upon my main object, that their essential importance as well as my own personal interest in them, constrained me to give them such consideration as my limits permitted.

We have seen in what way, probably, the creation of man connected him with the living creatures that preceded him; and how they all, in constitution and structure, pointed to and typified him, and this with greater and greater distinctness as they approached him in the ever ascending scale of being. Finally, he was reached as the end and crown of the whole creative series, and he occupied this place because by constitution and endowment he was fitted to become, in the fullness of time, as no other being could, the basis of a new creation, which through him was linked to all the past, while it reached forward to an eternal future. It now only remains to look for a little while at some of the divine handiworks lying outside of this measureless chain of living creatures, in order to see if these, like those, point to the same lordly being, and to him alone. And here, happily, I shall have but little if any reason to question the conclusions of those eminent scientists to whose profound researches I have already been so deeply indebted.

With reference to coal, for example, I fully accept their statement that there was a time in the creation of the world when there was no coal; nay, that for some long period before that, there was no vegetable material out of which it could have been made. Nor does it concern me how long ago that period was. They may say that it was millions or hundreds of millions or billions of years. No matter. The longer ago they can show it to have been, the better I like it. It helps me to realize that in that far-away point in eternity, and during the measureless ages that succeeded it, the Infinite Father was even then and always thinking about his future children; and, with tender consideration and wise forethought, was deliberately and patiently working for their interest, and providing for their welfare. First, he took all the time necessary—let it be what it might—to prepare the earth to receive and mature the plants from which the coal could be made; then for long, long periods successive crops of these plants grew to maturity, and spread abroad over the whole earth; meanwhile heat and light, brought from the sun, were carefully stored away in their structure, during their growth. Some of these plants were very peculiar—immense ferns and mosses and others. Many of the strange mosses, of which we have some degenerate and impoverished specimens still left, grew into great trees four or five feet in diameter. At length all things were ready—vast areas in every part of the world densely covered with these great plants whose structure rendered them specially suitable for the intended purpose. Next these were collected into immense heaps, very high and miles upon miles in length and width, then they were buried deep down in the earth, where they were subjected to powerful pressure and excluded from the air. Doubtless the process varied with the location and other special conditions, but I believe that what I have stated was substantially what was done in every case. And we may be sure that there in that compressed and smothered condition the material passed through a heating process, very slow and very long continued—just as long as was necessary to drive out and away the volatile elements of the wood, leaving the residuum as coal.

It is altogether probable that I have not described this process with the accuracy, and the fullness of knowledge and detail, that a well-equipped specialist would do, but it is manifest that my exposition is substantially correct; for, to say nothing more, we have the coal kilns or coal mines, still here with us, while the coals, many of them, give unmistakable evidence that they were once wood. These two facts cover, by necessary implication, the whole ground. Whoever has seen a country blacksmith prepare and burn a coal-kiln, has seen the whole of the natural process in principle. It will be noted that, first of all, he forsees a future need, and then purposes to provide for it. This foresight and purpose antedate every stroke of the work, and will be present at every stage in its progress. Moved by these he selects a suitable place for the kiln, prepares the ground for it, collects from the forest the necessary wood, piles it up on the place prepared, covers it with earth to prevent the free access of air, and finally, so fires the wood that, being thus smothered, it may slowly burn without being consumed and be deprived of its volatile elements, and thus become coal.

Now, every step in this progress shows a design looking to the next immediately succeeding result, and all of them at the same time pointing and leading to the final result—charcoal. But before and pervading all these, giving them activity and direction, was the higher reason, the ultimate purpose, for which the coal was wanted at all. It was to supply a need, and to be used. Whether the man himself or others were expected to need and to use it, clear it is that the work of making it could only have been undertaken and accomplished in contemplation of such need and use. Surely the reader cannot require assistance in applying every word of this illustration to the Divine Maker who has created and stored up in the earth such exhaustless quantities of the same most useful product. He has distributed it all over the world—giving to our country alone, saying nothing of others—to the United States alone—over 200,000 square miles of coal fields—not acres, mark you, but 200,000 square miles!

Without dwelling longer upon this, it is manifest that in the creation of the coal fields the following steps were necessary, saying nothing about what went before: 1. The preparation of the surface of the earth to receive and nourish the necessary plants. 2. To create plants adapted to grow in the soil and conditions then existing, and also suited to the purpose of being made into coal. 3. To develop those plants into great size, and to multiply them in immense numbers. 4. To collect and pile them into vast heaps, here and there over the whole world. 5. To bury those heaps deep down in the earth, and 6. To subject them there to such influences as would convert them into coal. If it were necessary to my purpose it were easy to point out how powerfully all this creative process supplements Paley's argument from design—how every step has reference immediately to the next succeeding one, and also to the ultimate result—how every single one was indispensable to that result—and, finally, that this was dependent not only upon the several steps that were taken, but upon their being taken in the exact order as stated. The probabilities against all this happening by mere accident are so exceedingly numerous as to leave no room for common sense to doubt the presence of a designing mind and the operation of an almighty power.

This, however, is not the point before us. My question is: What did the Creator want with coal? For what creatures and what purpose did he make it? Certainly not for the animal creation. They have no use for it. They cannot eat it or burn it. For them it gratifies no sense, serves no purpose, accomplishes no end. It is placed beyond their reach. They could not get to it if they would, they would not if they could. There is not a creature in this world or any world that needs it or that can use it except man. It is certain therefore that it was made for him, and exclusively for him—made and stored away, and preserved through long ages, solely for him—made evidently with forethought of his coming, and foreknowledge of his needs and his capacity to find it and bring it out and use it for his own comfort and well-being, and for the divine glory. And now at length the whole human race, directly or indirectly, is benefited by it. They may not all warm their bodies or cook their food by the sun-heat that is stored up in it, but it multiplies and cheapens the conveniences and necessaries of life, it brings them to their door, it draws the train upon which they ride, it fills the world with books and Bibles and carries them across the mighty deep, along with the missionaries of the cross and all the agencies of enlightenment and salvation, and it generates the electric force that brings the ends of the earth into instant communication. I need not dwell here, for it must be evident that this great creative work, the stages of which we can so clearly understand, and, in our limited measure reproduce, had direct reference, through its whole course, to him who was to be the end and lord of all creation.

I might, but I shall not, pursue a similar line of thought respecting the minerals of the earth, collected in vast storehouses for the future use and blessing of man, and man alone. We have already seen that the living creation continually pointed to, and culminated in, him. Thus we see that lines springing up in vast eternity, and passing through objects the most remote and unlike, and that could have had no sort of influence upon each other, all converge upon one and the same single object—man. Surely we cannot duly consider all this without coming to a better appreciation of our worth in the estimation of the infinite mind, and realizing that that mind must have and does have high and holy and glorious uses for us. Can we by going forward from the point now reached, ascertain what they are?

When March Winds Blow

By OLIVE THORNE MILLER,
Author of "Nesting Time," etc.

"Like hungry wolves in a howling pack
Are the mighty winds astir."
—Elizabeth Akers.

March, in our part of the world, offers few attractions for the home-coming birds. Spring-like days occasionally delude us with sweet promise of summer, but Old Boreas, blowing fit to crack his cheeks, is a true symbol of the season. Birds, however, are already astir. The bluebird, "New England's poet laureate, telling us spring has come," delivers his musical message on the first warm day. The robin, too, "goes by the almanac, by the middle of March he hurries back," and his gladsome voice is welcome announcement of coming delights.

Not that bird voices have been altogether lacking through the season now passing. Even in the city streets we have had the far-from-welcome gossipy sparrows, while dwellers in the country about have been blessed with the cheerful notes of chickadee and goldfinch, the drumming of hardy woodpeckers and the inspiring scream of the jolly bluejay.

When March throws open the doors, even though it is with a blast from the North Pole, our dear summer friends rush in—and song begins. Early in the month we may hear the gushing lyric of the song sparrow, the "wandering voice" of the bluebird, the tender warble of the tree sparrow, and even the rare sweet song of his fox-colored brother, lingering on his way to the north.

Now, too, we shall see grackles in flocks, breasting the gale, and shouting with glee as if they enjoyed it; the loud clear whistle of the epauletted red-wing shall ring out from the swamps, and the pensive strain of the meadow-lark fill the fields with music. In fact, the whole bird world is under way, and the thought comes to us with a thrill, that far to the south, even in South America, our old friends and neighbors are stirring—are pluming their wings for their joyous flight back to the land of their hopes. It is great happiness to welcome the wanderers home, to be prepared with food for our too eager little brothers, when winter steals back with blizzards and snow storms and frost that tightly locks bird granaries.

Not only has house-hunting begun, but some of the brave little mothers are already settled to their summer's work. Owls may be found sitting, sometimes on nests decorated with icicles. Some of the ground-nesting birds have made their snug cradles and have been discovered buried, with their eggs, under the snow, but still cheery and hopeful. That eccentric bird, the crossbill, "with songs like legends strange to hear," who pays us fleeting visits from the land of snow and ice where his heart and his food are, sometimes sets up a home in our climate, beguiled, perhaps, by the snow and ice of the early spring months.

Even our matter-of-fact fellow-creature, the robin, sensible as we should expect her to show herself—even she sometimes grows impatient to see her young family around her, and goes to housekeeping too soon. More than once has the little mother been found faithful, but frozen, on her nest. We all know the tragedy of the bluebirds a few years ago, who were caught in a prolonged snowstorm and perished by thousands. But generally the feathered folk weather the storms, seek out some warm retreat among the close-growing evergreens, fluff out their feathers and bear their reverses like philosophers.

Spring is the time to study the language of the birds. For in that season of home-making and nursery duties all the varied emotions of their lives are called out. Unlike the rest of the year, they are bound to one place. They cannot flee from unpleasantnesses—they must stay and meet them. The importance of selecting safe places for nesting, the constant watch for enemies, the many dangers that threaten, make these anxious days, and bring out characteristics seen at no other time. Then, when sitting is over, there is a nursery full of helpless nestlings to rear, to protect from accidents, to provide with food, to instruct in the path of life. All these make spring the most serious and eventful, as well as the most interesting, season in their lives.

At this time the conversational abilities of our little brothers are in full play, and they are far greater than is usually supposed. Besides the well-known songs and calls which everyone may hear, there are many low notes with the mates and the young that bless the ear of the sympathetic bird-lover alone, and force him to the irresistible conclusion that they are exchanges of sentiment—talk, in fact. No one who has closely studied birds at this period in their lives doubts that they have some sort of language—

"For what are the voices of birds
—Aye and of beasts—but words, our words
Only so much more sweet?"

Birds are seen to consult over their difficulties, sometimes to dispute, to quarrel, to settle upon a line of action, and to make little remarks. This may be observed with great clearness in captive birds. Where one bird of a species will pass his days in silence except when singing, two of them will keep up a constant chatter. Conversation may be seen too in the sparrows of our streets, who are great talkers. If we could understand, we might get their opinions of us and of our doings, which they watch with so much apparent interest. It would be interesting, though perhaps not flattering, to know how human life appears from the bird's point of view.

No one will question the assertion that birds can scold. Orioles are the most proficient in this accomplishment of any birds I know, especially the orchard oriole, who can hardly deliver his sweet song without the interpolation of scolding notes. The world seems to be all wrong with this fellow-mortal. Even his wooing is a rather savage affair, and conducted with many hard words. His little mate has plainly learned to manage her domineering partner, for, in the several I have known, she never talks back, but goes quietly on, and has her own way in spite of his blustering. One of these birds whom I had several years ago in semi-freedom in my house, actually bullied and teased his modest little spouse—a beautiful bird and a sweet singer—till she was starved and worried to death, to my great grief, for I had not suspected this result.

The house wren, too, is a bumptious individual, always ready with an opinion, and speaking his mind on every occasion.

The "fire-winged blackbird" is another who takes the burden of the world on his shoulders, while his mate is sitting, and protests vigorously at the intrusion of any one upon the territory he claims as his own. Not only does he make it uncomfortable for the feathered world, but he has no faith in the honest intentions of the human race. Sound reason he has too for that opinion, for he is one of the persecuted. It is doubtless because of this bird's arduous labors in protecting his family that, as soon as the young can look out for themselves, he returns to bachelor ways. In a gay flock, all the fathers of the neighborhood depart, leaving their mates and young to take care of themselves. This is a rare thing among birds, who are usually model parents. Most of them not only feed and train their little families in the way they should go, teach them their manners and their songs, but submit to imposition of the true American style at their hands.

Nothing impresses the intelligent student of bird manners and customs more strongly than the "human nature" (so called) that they display. Their loves and hates, their anxieties and fears, their joys and sorrows are plain to be seen, and their peculiarities of character are strongly marked. And there is as great diversity among them as among one's human acquaintances. They show individuality in disposition and manners, and they do not exactly resemble one another even in looks. A close observer comes to know individuals, not merely species. Keepers of birds in captivity have long recognized these facts. This is what gives the study of bird life its great and lasting charm. Each new bird is a fresh subject, and nesting-time offers the golden opportunity to make his acquaintance.

The Study of History in Our Colleges.

F. W. Collins.

The present awakening with respect to our educational interests is a good omen. Advancement in education, during the century which has just closed, has kept pace with that in other lines. In the quantity and quality of work, in the range and variety of subjects offered and in methods of instruction, our educational system has in recent years undergone a complete transformation. In the higher education this change has been wrought, for the most part, in the last quarter of the century, or, to speak more particularly, it has come with the introduction and extension of the elective system, first instituted at Harvard University. The range of studies thus made possible, and the consequent multiplication and subdivision of courses, and also the application of the "laboratory method" to all studies, literary as well as scientific, have produced in higher education a genuine renaissance.

Not only have the courses in the classics, mathematics and philosophy, the standbys of the old curriculum, been greatly extended and diversified, but a large number of other subjects have been introduced and placed upon an equal footing with these. History, literature, economics, sociology and kindred subjects are prominent among the courses offered by the high grade college or university of the present day. The popularity of these courses in the larger schools indicates what must be the policy of any college that would command a fair share of public patronage.

A few years ago the standing announcement appeared in the annual publications of one of our colleges that "special emphasis is laid upon those studies that are distinctively modern." A liberal and progressive spirit has always been characteristic of that school. The same remark may doubtless be applied to most of our schools. But recent developments in the educational world have been so rapid that the statement quoted above can no longer be accepted as expressing the facts as to our own schools. Attention is here called to the status of history in our colleges, not as being a solitary case, but as being one of the more important of the "modern" studies.

In the following comparative statement, the schedules of historical studies have been reduced to a common basis, the numbers indicating the recitation hours per week for a period of one year which the entire work in history provides. On this basis, five of our representative colleges offer ten, eight, six, six and five hours, respectively. No account is here taken of the grades below the college proper, but as the preparatory work is practically the same, both in this group of schools and in the group that follows, the omission does not affect the comparison.

On the same basis three other institutions, not our own, present historical studies as follows: One offers twelve hours, but with indications of such variation in the courses offered in alternate years as would make the work available for the continuous student perhaps twice that amount, or twenty-four hours. The second offers twenty-three hours and the third, forty-seven. These are not eastern universities, but representative of the better class of schools of the middle west. If the institutions of highest rank in the west, such as the Universities of Wisconsin, Michigan and Chicago, had been selected for the comparison, the showing would have been perhaps much greater, or at least comparable to the one last referred to in the second group.

The difference here shown is emphasized by the fact that in most of the schools of the first group it does not appear that even one instructor is devoted exclusively to the department of history, whereas in the second group the number of names appearing in this department is three, two and six respectively. This is suggestive also as to the quality of the work. Method is of very great importance in historical study and instruction. Satisfactory work is impossible without special training in advanced methods and the liberty of the instructor to devote himself to his specialty. The spirit and method of original research should receive emphasis in the advanced college grades, so giving preparation and stimulus for the higher work of the university.

Two suggestions only will here be made looking toward improvement in the particular line of work under consideration. It is possible that there is still needed on the part of our college authorities a truer conception of the place of history in the college curriculum. It is evident, of course, from the statements already made, that there is no longer any sympathy with the idea expressed a few years ago by one who was then at the head of one of our colleges, that history was "sufficiently taught in connection with Latin and Greek." That college now ranks among the best of our schools in its provision for historical study. But it is still true that in order to compete successfully with other schools with which our own are necessarily in rivalry, as well as because of the value of history, both on its own account and in relation to other studies, it should be given a larger place in our college work. From being a subordinate and little more than incidental study in the course, it should be raised to a position of equal prominence with the others. It is, of course, neither possible nor desirable that the college should do the work of the university, either in its variety and extent, or in all its methods, but such advancement as is here suggested seems to be made necessary by the growing demands.

But it is not to be supposed that the difficulty consists chiefly, if at all, in low ideals. The pressing need now is the means to enable our educators more adequately to realize their ideals. It would be unjust to speak disparagingly of the work done by our colleges with the means placed at their disposal. Instead, the highest praise is due. But present educational ideals call for greatly increased endowments. In what has been said thus far more is implied than has been stated. While history has some special claims to recognition, its advancement to the place here contended for ought to mean a proportionate prominence for other studies now in comparative obscurity. It would call for larger library facilities than are possessed by most of our colleges, to keep up with a large and increasing special literature. It would mean also a much more extended application of the elective system, which in turn calls for a larger number of teachers. Again, if the spirit of original investigation is developed in the student, it will be because the instructor is himself engaged in that kind of work, and this requires that he shall have some leisure from routine duties.

From every point of view it is clear that the great need is larger endowments for our colleges. The plea for endowment that our schools are now making should be heard patiently and sympathetically by those who have money to bestow.

The complaint is frequently heard that many of our young people are attending other schools. This should not be a matter of surprise. There are, indeed, very important reasons why it is better for our young people to attend our own schools even with their present equipment, but these reasons are not always appreciated. It may, of course, be said with truth that the considerations here presented are not those that influence the majority of young people in the choice of a school, but they are precisely those that determine the choice of the brightest and best, whose attendance it is most important to secure.

The Preacher for To-day

By REV. JOSEPH PARKER, D.D.

Minister of the City Temple, London.

Apostolic Preaching.

The preacher for the twentieth century would not do badly for himself or for his cause if he studied the preaching that was so striking and effective in the first century. Those who boast,and perhaps justly, of being apostolic in their spirit and methods should return to the apostolic point of view in the matter of preaching, as well as endeavor to imitate it in the matter of polity. How did men preach in the first century of the Christian era? Did they write sermons and read them to languid or resentful congregations? Did they study the classical use of words and pride themselves on polished composition and eloquent effusion, to say nothing of mechanical and calculated climax? In apostolic times very great effects suddenly followed the preaching of the gospel. We read that when one sermon was delivered the hearers gnashed with their teeth upon the preacher and hurled him out to be stoned. On another occasion we read that whilst the hearers listened they were pricked in their hearts, and cried out, some with vengeance, and some with a degree of penitence. The gospel has always in its best preaching been followed by two distinctly contrastive effects. First it has either been received with gladness, with a great emotion of thankfulness and consciousness of a new life of love in the heart; or it has been resented, denounced and virulently hated. We have little of the latter effect in our own age. The sermon has lost so much of its point, emphasis and high color that it is barely tolerated by one section and almost conscientiously avoided by another, even of the church-going public.

Sensationalism.

Is there not a good deal of heedless talk uttered against what is called the "sensationalism" of the pulpit? There is a sense in which we all detest sensationalism. Is there not another sense in which sensationalism may be legitimate, and may, indeed, be necessary to the certification of the preacher's personal sincerity and earnestness? Nobody could hear the Apostle Paul with indifference. When audiences turned away from him they did not speak about the weather or about local politics, they spoke immediately and emphatically about the discourse to which they had just listened; they stamped with their feet, they gnashed with their teeth, or they openly gave God thanks and rejoiced with a great joy. I desire to put critics on their guard against confusing one sort of sensationalism with another.

A Man With a Message.

The preacher for the twentieth century must have a definite, luminous and practical message to his day. He will have no need to puzzle his brains as to the selection of a subject; his topic is assigned to him. He is a man who has taken "holy orders" in the best sense—taken them directly and immediately from the Head of the Church. He has not merely to preach about the gospel, but to preach the gospel in its heart, soul and essence, and to do this with abiding and beneficent effect he must, so to say, be bathed in the very river of the gospel. His subjects will flow upon him. He will not be suffering from spiritual dearth or pulpit sterility; he will be, indeed, embarrassed by the riches with which God will entrust all his faithful stewards. The preacher for the twentieth century must be full of the New Testament. If he can repeat it word for word in the original language, so much the better. The preacher ought, at all events, to be able to repeat most of the New Testament, certainly all the utterances of Christ, in his mother tongue. We are not called upon to invent a gospel, but to preach one. We are men under authority. We have had, as it were, direct personal communication with the Master, and all we have to do is to apply his sayings to the age in which we live.

An Out-of-Door Man.

The preacher for the twentieth century must be a man who lives in the open air. We have had enough of monastic preaching. Preaching is not a learned profession, an art or a craft only known to those who have been masonically initiated. The preacher must be, I repeat, a fresh-air man; that is to say, he must know life at all its vital points, and he must know human nature in all its variety of development and expression. Human nature is the really original language. Hebrew and Greek, so far as Scriptures are concerned, are known as the original languages, but human nature is a language more original still. What are its motives, its impulses, its self-deceptions, its greatest possibilities, its lowest knaveries, and its supremest moods? We must not preach as if we were preaching to dolls or mummies or statues made of clay or carved in stone. The people must be made to feel that the man who is preaching to them is part of the age in which they both live. The impression made by the preacher should never be—See how much more I know of religious things than any mere layman can ever know. That is the worst popery. Popery is never so bad as when it is perpetrated under Protestant patronage and shelter. I have sometimes thought that a preacher should rather study to avoid anything even in dress,or in "holy whine," which separates him from the great commonality of the people.

Not a Reformer, but a Transformer.

The preacher for this century will not be so much a revolutionist as a transformer. There are reformers enough. Jesus Christ never attempted to reform society; he regarded it as sick unto death; he regarded it as beyond self-help; he came to seek and to save that which was lost. As the Lord himself transformed the common bread and wine into symbols of his body and blood, so the preacher who would influence his age profoundly and beneficently must show the possible religious uses of common things. The age of mean things has gone. The people are now prepared to see the idealism and true poetry of things. The preacher of the gospel of Christ is not a member of a committee at work for the reform of society. He has come with a special mission, and nothing must distract his attention. Whilst he is in the pulpit he has nothing to do with merely local disputes or angry controversies; he has to lay down great principles, which will put an end to all tumults, and to unrighteous and complicated conflicts. The preacher is not to be a clever little sub-committeeman; he has always to stand upon the sublimest heights and to unveil the purpose and the nearness of the kingdom of God.

A True Priest.

He is to be a true,in contradistinction to a formal or artificial, priest. I see no reason why we should regard the word priest with prejudice,except in so far as it has been misapplied by men who have had some knavish purpose to accomplish. Jesus Christ himself is a priest, the Priest, the High Priest. In our degree we should as preachers cultivate the priestly element. God has been pleased in his good providence to work through agency, instrumentality, or some kind of mediation. There is one Advocate with God. As we are followers of that Advocate, and as we hold our orders from him, we, too, should be intercessors, pleaders, holding the people in our hearts, and bearing them up before God in loving, wise and tender prayer. Our ministers must never forget that there is pastoral prayer as certainly as there is pastoral visitation. The former is infinitely preferable to the latter, as the latter is often perfunctorily carried out. We must have no dominion over other men's faith. We must not hold a secret which the simplest heart cannot share with us. Indeed, that simplest heart, if it fail to equal us in knowledge, may greatly surpass us in love. The strong man holds his strength for the weak. The wise man is the trustee of the uninstructed man. So it is with the truly good Christian preacher. What he holds, he holds for the benefit of all the people.

Antiquary and Contemporary.

The preacher for the twentieth century must be a contemporary rather than an antiquarian. Some of our people really do not care much about the heresies of the early centuries of the Christian era. There is great danger that, by cultivating a merely monastic acquaintance with ancient names and antiquated heresies, the preacher may become so infatuated as to regard himself as a kind of priest in the Romish sense. The people who long to go back and search the archives of forgotten centuries should put themselves on a still higher level, and go back, as it were, into the chambers of eternity and listen to the counsels that were held before the foundation of the world. The fault I have to find with many people is not that they are antiquated, but that they are not sufficiently venerable. If they were more venerable they would be more modern. I would not advise the preacher for the twentieth century to go back to the Puritans; I would strongly advise him to go back to the Prophets and to the Apostles.

London, England.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

J. M. Rudy, speaking of the work of the late N. A. McConnell as a preacher, says: "Of all who were converted under his preaching very few fell away. They were not simply numerical additions to the church; they were converts. They became stalwart Christians. They were able to give a reason for the hope that was in them." J. W. Ingram is quoted as saying: "His methods were so purely scriptural and his building so guarded that but few of those converted under his labors ever turned their backs upon the ancient gospel."

Permit me to add that in my association with Nelson A. McConnell, I found him to be a constant and reverent student of the word. I spent some time with him in Cedar Rapids, Ia., last April. It was evident that he had been a lifelong student of the Bible. For a man without the training of the schools his thought was remarkably accurate and his language choice. He was a teacher as well as a student. At the fireside and from house to house he preached the word. Bro. Rudy may well congratulate himself that he enjoyed the companionship of this rare man for the space of two years.

Since the days of the fathers the issues have changed. The gospel, however, is unchanged and unchangeable. Paul said: "If any man preach any other gospel let him be accursed." The gospel that Paul preached came by revelation and was stereotyped. It was the gospel for all time. But this gospel can be presented in an infinite variety of ways. The gospel as preached now ought to meet the present experiences of the people. Present issues ought to be discussed in the light of divine revelation. The fathers discussed the issues of their time in this way; and it was because they did so that they were men of power. Their sons ought to imitate them in this regard. But to do so they must have the word dwelling in them richly. The heroic men whom we fondly call the fathers were more anxious to instruct those to whom they spoke than they were to gain additions to the congregations. Enlightenment was primary; additions to the church was secondary. Additions to the church is now, sometimes, primary—instruction, enlightenment, intelligence often not even thought of. Isn't this true?

There seems to be a rage for numbers. This remark does not apply alone to the Disciples of Christ. It has seriously damaged the Christian Endeavor movement. All churches are, to a degree, guilty at this point. Let converts be weighed as well as counted.

Some time ago I read in one of our papers that a well known church has more than a thousand members. I obtained a copy of the yearbook of this church, recently published, and counted the names. The entire number of names was 695. Of this number, 36 are not residents of the city in which the church is located and 96 are marked "unknown." This leaves a nominal membership of 564—instead of more than a thousand. I say "nominal," for there is no way known to me of ascertaining that they are members of the body of Christ. Do they attend the meetings of the church? Do they feed their spiritual natures daily by reading, prayer and meditation? Do they aid in the financial, social or moral support of the church? Do their daily lives indicate that they are in fellowship with the Christ? If not, why speak of them as members of his church?

I examined another church register and found 460 names, of which 175 were marked "unknown," leaving the names of 285 as known members of this church instead of 460, as appears on the face of the directory.

I heard certain members of a congregation speak of their church as having 1,200 members. There are sittings in the audience room of the house of worship belonging to this congregation, at a liberal estimate, for 500 people. Where do the 700 come together to break bread on the first day of the week? The fact is the church to which reference is made has not more than 600 members.

Some years ago a wide-awake, up-to-date man became pastor of a congregation reputed to have a communicant membership of about 800. He tried to find them. He worked in person. By committees he searched for them. The postal authorities were utilized. The utmost diligence was employed to find the 800 members. About 500 persons were found who confessed that they were members of that church.

The pastor and clerk of another congregation went over the list of names carefully. There were 200 men and women living in the town in which the church was located who had not attended a meeting of the congregation for a half dozen years. At least one man whose name was on the church register was the proprietor of a notorious liquor saloon. There were about 100 names of persons of good repute, so far as the pastor and clerk knew, not residents of the town in which the church was located. The cities and towns in which these persons lived were known; but they were doing nothing to aid the church in its work. Thirty-five or forty were "unknown." The congregation had a communicant membership of from 400 to 450; but the printed directory showed a membership of something like 800. Brethren, beloved in the Lord, these things ought not so to be. Is it in this way that the Disciples number 1,150,000?

After the death of Henry Ward Beecher in 1887 the register of Plymouth Church was revised and 1,000 names were dropped. It required courage to do this. Such courage is needed by the authorities in other churches than the Plymouth Congregational. A good revival in many a congregation of Disciples of Christ would be the elimination of from 25 to 50 per cent. of the names on the church records.

The contributions to Foreign Missions again and again in churches reporting a large membership do not indicate a large and spiritually vital membership. Here is a church claiming 1,300 members whose name is not found in the reports of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society and the American Christian Missionary Society. Here is a church which claims to have a membership of 400 reasonably well-to-do folks, whose annual contribution to the work of winning men to the Christ is $11.35. And this is primitive Christianity revived!

The real test of a church's vitality is its interest in the Great Commission: "preach the gospel to the whole creation;" "make disciples of all the nations." This is now the sign of a standing or a falling church.

Denver, Col.

Old-World Sources of a New-World Movement.

By E. S. Ames.

Scotland and, to a less degree, Ireland and England are the countries which furnish important elements in this new-world religious movement. Thomas and Alexander Campbell and Walter Scott and others transmitted and transformed those elements. A study of these elements shows at least four well defined sources, more or less complex, which have given form and content to the work of the Disciples of Christ. These are: (1) the Covenant or Federal Theology; (2) the divided condition of the church and the growing desire for union; (3) various Independent church movements, particularly in Scotland; (4) the philosophy of Locke.

1. The covenant theology is an interpretation of God's relation to man, based upon the conception of a covenant or contract. Passages of Scripture like Hebrews 8:10; 9:15, 16, form the proof texts for it. This form of theology was developed in the seventeenth century and became a prominent feature of the Westminster Confession. This confession was dominant in the Presbyterian and other churches of Scotland and England and still ruled the thought of sects which had thrown off allegiance to it. The covenant theology divides the history of mankind into different dispensations or covenants, as for example, "the era of the patriarchs, where the kingdom was a family, and law was given through conscience; the legal era in which grace was shown through the prophets and typical ceremonies, the kingdom being national; the post-legal, in which Christ appeared and the kingdom became universal." Among men both parties share in making the terms of a covenant, but between God and man the former proposes and the latter merely accepts or rejects. In working out his purposes, God abrogates old contracts and submits new ones. These mark the great periods or "ages" of history. Alexander Campbell adopted this phraseology and interpreted the Scriptures throughout from this point of view. (Christian Baptism, chapter 6.)

It is important to note that the Federal Theology has always promoted a searching study of the Scriptures. Nevertheless the idea of the covenants has sometimes been overworked, producing an entirely legalistic conception of religion. Neither should it be forgotten that many theologians did not accept the principles of this theology at all, particularly the Lutherans. (Fisher's History of Christian Doctrine, p. 347ff.)

2. The numerous petty sects, degrading and weakening the churches, intensified the desire for union in the larger and more spiritual natures of the time. The narrowness and hatred engendered in the church was only equaled by the infidelity and atheism outside of it. This was the price which Protestantism had to pay for basing religion on a first-hand interpretation of the Scriptures. The effect of such divisions was to convince the leading spirits that the terms of membership must be simplified in accordance with the Bible. Chillingworth in the middle of the seventeenth century said: "I am fully assured that God does not, and therefore man ought not, to require any more of any man than this—to believe the Scripture to be God's word, to endeavor to find the true sense of it, and to live according to it." In the same period Jeremy Taylor and Richard Baxter advocated a simple and broad religious platform for the sake of unity and peace. It is an interesting fact that Deism was occasioned by the intense agitation and prolonged strife of parties on the subject of religion, which had existed in England for nearly two centuries. The Deists sought unity and tolerance in the simple truths of natural religion. In this way it is seen that for centuries before the history of the Disciples begins, Christian Union was an ideal which hovered before the true prophets of the kingdom of God.

3. At the beginning of this century there were several attempts in Scotland to achieve a truly biblical, unsectarian presentation of Christianity. With these Thomas and Alexander Campbell and their co-laborers were familiar. It is not necessary here to detail the characteristics of the Haldanes, Sandemanians and Glasites, or to point out how they differed from each other. The Haldanes were particularly influential in suggesting views which are now characteristic of the Disciples. They held the Scriptures as the only authority; they adopted the congregational form of church government; the essential element in their preaching was the divinity, dignity and glory of Christ; they contended that ecclesiastical usages should conform to the practices of the apostolic churches; they celebrated the Lord's Supper every Lord's day; they favored a plurality of elders in every church; they held immersion to be baptism but did not make it a term of communion. (Memoirs of A. Campbell, Vol. II.)

4. Another determining factor in this movement was the philosophy of John Locke. That philosophy expresses the dominant note of the eighteenth century. It was the philosophy of common sense and individualism. The Essay Concerning the Human Understanding was Locke's greatest work. He held that men should be guided by reason and not be swayed by "enthusiasm." He taught that faith is in accord with, but goes beyond, reason. The source of our knowledge is the senses. Consequently any knowledge of God must be revealed through the senses. Mr. Campbell was trained in this school of thought and adopted its characteristic principles. He applied it in theology. For example, he said, "faith is the belief of testimony" and conversion is due to the written word alone. For the same reasons he said, "the best qualifications for the apostles were good eyes and good ears." The theological writings of Locke were also influential with the early Reformers. He wrote a volume to show that the only confession which Christ and the apostles required of men was that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God. He found that to be the one theme of the Gospels and of the Acts. Locke decried the metaphysical speculations of the scholastics and rejected the traditional theology. He advocated the largest toleration in the church and also in the state. He wrote commentaries on the Epistles of Paul which have the freshness and vigor of an original interpretation by a master mind. It is safe to say that the writings of Locke constitute one of the most definite and fruitful sources of this great nineteenth century religious movement. (Alexander Campbell's Theology, by Garrison.)

Scenes from the Inauguration

By EDWARD B. BAGBY

Ex-Chaplain of the House of Representatives.

Dame Nature is capricious. She favored us the last inauguration day with the brightest and balmiest of weather and gave assurance that she had another of the same sort in stock this year. For five weeks we had days of sunshine and on March 3, Chief Moore of the Weather Bureau said: "The weather to-morrow will be the finest ever experienced on the inauguration of a president. The sky surely will be clear and the temperature warm. I will stake my reputation upon the correctness of this prediction." Everybody knows of the cold, dismal rain mixed with snow and sleet that fell that day. And the reputation of the weather forecaster? Some say he did not have any to lose.

The weather, as disagreeable as it was, did not spoil the pleasure of our citizens and their one hundred thousand visitors. It was the people and not the rain that the papers described as "rivulets pouring from all the streets into the great river on Pennsylvania Avenue, with deeper pools and eddies around the White House and the Capitol."

There was a great demand for tickets of admission to the Senate Chamber where the inaugural ceremonies of the Vice-president were to occur and the grand stand in front of the Capitol where the President was to take the oath of office and deliver the inaugural address. Some of the senators with more importunate constituents than tickets were willing to pay $50 each for extra sittings. There was no lack of accommodations for those who sought the avenue. If you had $500 at your disposal you could rent a choice second story room. For fifty cents you could get a reserved seat in some enterprising huckster's wagon backed into an intersecting street. If without funds you could stand on the sidewalk.

Your correspondent and family were fortunate in being the guests of Engraver Henry Brewood, an elder of the Ninth Street Church. In his spacious windows, surrounded by a congenial company and with hot refreshments served through the day we did not mind the long wait of five hours before the return of the procession.

As we looked out on Pennsylvania Avenue, "the thoroughfare made historic by gay procession, triumphant pageant and sorrowful cortege," busy scenes were being enacted at each end of the line of march. At the White House, the President, surrounded by his cabinet, was examining and signing bills passed during the last hours of Congress. Mrs. McKinley was spared the ordeal of trunk-packing, leave-taking and hurrying out to find some hospitable shelter that caused such sadness to our citizens in the case of her predecessor. At the capital the gloom of the skies above the dome was slight in comparison with that which enveloped scores of Congressmen, when they learned that Senator Carter was talking to death the river and harbor bill, and that their share of its $50,000,000 appropriation would not materialize.

Now, the long delay is over and up the broad avenue the majestic procession moves, following the President who alights in the center of the beautiful court of honor and takes his place in the reviewing stand. For four hours there is a panorama of soldiers in variegated uniforms, flashing bayonets and waving banners. The West Point and Annapolis cadets are the recipients of the most vociferous applause. The Pennsylvania troops are much in evidence. Col. Roosevelt is accorded far greater honor than is usually shown the newly installed Vice-president. The appearance in line of a troop of dark-skinned Porto Ricans sets one wondering how many such wards of the nation will be seen in future processions. The civic organizations in their kaleidoscopic costumes bring up the rear.

To the permanent residents of Washington monster parades become an old story, but to the 80,000 colored people here they remain an unfailing source of delight. As I noticed their hilarity over the music I was reminded of a remark of an old senator who when asked about the marvelous sights he had witnessed on the avenue, replied: "Yes, but there is one thing I have never seen there. I have never seen a procession with a band going in one direction and a colored man going in the other."

The inaugural ball we have as an inheritance of Washington's times. The term is a misnomer. It is a mammoth reception where ten thousand people pay five dollars each to get crushed in the big Pension Building and, incidentally, help the inaugural committee pay the expenses of the celebration.

At the Congressional Library a few days ago I was interested in looking at the National Intelligencer of March 6, 1801, and reading the account of the inauguration of President Jefferson a century ago. The contrast of this paper with the Washington Post of March 5, 1901, forcibly illustrates the growth of the press in this time. The Intelligencer contained four pages, with thirteen columns of reading matter, and had its description of the inaugural ceremonies condensed to one-half a column. The Post had twenty-eight pages, about one hundred and fifty columns of reading matter, and filled seventy columns with descriptions. The Intelligencer speaks of the inauguration as "a spectacle of uncommon animation," though only two companies of soldiers paraded. It declares the attendance "the largest concourse of citizens ever assembled here," though all were seated in the small Senate Chamber. It closes the account with the statement, "The remainder of the day was devoted to festivity, and at night there was a pretty general illumination." A hundred years hence the people will smile over the accounts of our fireworks and electric lights as we do at the tallow candle illumination of a century ago.

Current Literature.

Mrs. Humphry Ward's last novel, Eleanor, does not strike one as a particularly healthy story, but it is unquestionably a very able presentation of a series of complicated situations, political, religious and personal. The scene is Italy and three themes are interwoven in the story. First, there is a political theme based on the hostility between the papacy and the government in modern Italy. Mr. Manisty, an English politician who has left the Liberal party in a sudden rage, has settled in a villa near Rome to write a book, showing how despicable has become the condition of Italy since its unification under the Piedmontese kings involving the destruction of the pope's temporal power. He is not a religious man but considers established religion necessary as an instrument to get conduct out of the masses. The second theme is one of personal love and jealousy. Eleanor, a distant relative of Manisty, has been his constant companion in his work and is in love with him and correspondingly jealous of a beautiful American girl of the Puritan type who is their guest. The jealous woman carries away her rival to a retreat in central Italy and there conquers her jealousy by learning to love her. The religious theme is developed in connection with the experiences of a devout Catholic priest, who was excommunicated on account of a book which he had written embodying but a fraction of the things which he knew to be true, but tending toward the disintegration of the Catholic system. Manisty, the pope-loving free-thinker, recognized that the priest was right but held that the church was also right in excommunicating him, because the integrity of its system must be maintained at any cost. The religious teaching of the book, if it has any, grows out of this phase and issues in the proposition that, useful as the system may be in controlling the masses, the truth is more important than the system.

As usual in Mrs. Ward's stories, the descriptive portions are well done, but sometimes overdone, and the action is painfully slow. Conversations and discussions take the place of situations in it, and we can at least thank our literary stars that here at last we have a popular novel which is not likely to be dramatized. (Harpers. $1.50.)

Meredith Nicholson's treatise on The Hoosiers is scarcely the sort of book which one would expect a poet to write. Coming in a series of "National Studies in American Literature" under the able and scholarly editorship of Professor George E. Woodbury, the author was, of course, under obligation to treat his task quite seriously. Accordingly, he conscientiously chooses what he considers the most important features in the development of civilization and literature in Indiana, rather than those points which are intrinsically picturesque and interesting. By so doing he produces unquestionably a book of distinct value for the reader who comes to it with a serious desire to learn how the life of Hoosierdom has developed, but he only partly succeeds in dissipating the dullness which is almost inseparable from local history when written as history. In spite of its substantial merits, it will arouse comparatively little interest outside of Indiana and probably no great enthusiasm even in that state. (Macmillan Company, $1.25.)

Among contemporary writers of poetry none has developed a stronger or more characteristic style or exhibited a more soundly poetic imagination than Stephen Phillips. He is at his best in the poetical drama and in this field nothing more exquisite than his "Paola and Francesca" has been written in many years. His latest work is Herod, a Tragedy, which relates in perfect poetical form and in a style admirably adapted to the somber hue of the events, the story of King Herod's jealousy of his wife's brother, whom he had made high priest and whom the populace wished to make king, and of the final murder by the king's order of both the wife and her brother. Mr. Phillips' work strikes but a single note, and that a mournful one, but he is doing much to keep alive the spirit of true poetry and his works are to be reckoned with by any one who cherishes the pessimistic opinion that all the poets of this modern day have degenerated into mere rhymsters. (John Lane. $1.50.)

More March Magazines.

The leading article in the North American Review is by Archbishop Ireland on the interesting topic "The Pope's Civil Princedom," arguing, of course, that the Bishop of Rome should be restored to his position as an independent sovereign. The writer errs in laying down this fundamental proposition: "The Pope, all, of course, concede, must have absolute freedom of action in the work of governing the church and of teaching faith and morals." The Protestant world makes no such concession. We do not concede that the Pope should have absolute freedom of action, for instance, to imprison, torture and put to death those who deny the Catholic doctrines. In the days when the popes had absolute freedom of action they did such things and many more of the same kind. Protestantism maintains that the representatives of Romanism, including the Pope, are entitled to as much freedom as it demands for itself, but are not entitled to any sort of freedom which destroys the freedom of individuals who may differ with them. General Harrison continues his "Musings upon Current Topics," treating of, first, the relations of the United States to Great Britain, in which he recalls the unpleasantnesses that have existed between us during the past century and insists that we owe no sympathy to Great Britain in her present war, and second, the Boer war, in which the position of Great Britain is severely criticized. General Harrison is developing into a vigorous and habitual Britain-hater in his old age. An article on "The Business Situation in the United States" shows the country to be in a marvelously good condition. Rev. Judson Smith writes a historical retrospect of Protestant Foreign Missions in the nineteeth century. One is glad to notice that he pays no attention to such ignorant and unmannerly flings as that of Mark Twain in a recent number of this magazine. Prof. Richard T. Ely discusses the question of municipal ownership of natural monopolies. Whether or not municipal ownership is desirable he says depends upon "the nature of the social mind"; it depends upon whether or not our civilization has so far socialized men as to make them capable of co-operative action to this degree. We are at least tending toward a condition in which public ownership will be both feasible and desirable. Frederic Harrison's article on "Positivism, its Positions, Aims and Ideals" may be considered as the most concise and authoritative statement on this subject that has appeared in recent years, for Mr. Harrison is undoubtedly the recognized chief of present day Positivists.

The review of current happenings given in the World's Work continues to present an adequate and interesting, but somewhat colorless, survey of the doings of the month. An article by Jacob A. Riiss describes the institutional down-town work of Dr. Rainsford's church in New York City. Other articles are entitled "Improving the National Capital," "Can I Make a Farm Pay?" and "Literature for the Millions," the latter being a study of the career of Mr. Harmsworth.

The Cosmopolitan seems more than ever given over to pictures and sketches of people whom no one really cares anything about. The absurd and dreary fantasmagoria entitled "The First Man in the Moon" drags on its weary length with the promise that its long-desired conclusion will come with the next number. The issue is redeemed by an article from Sir Robert Hart on "The Boxer Movement," one by Brander Matthews on "The Folk Theater," and a treatment by Prof. Ely of "The Problem of Municipal Ownership" similar to that in the North American Review but briefer and lighter.

Kipling is to the front again in the Literary Era in an article entitled "The Paganism of Kipling." The writer uses the term "paganism" with no invidious intent but merely to indicate that his work, with its splendid vigor and vividness, smells of the earth. The reading public is under obligation to the writer who characterizes "An Englishwoman's Love Letters" as "a horrible example for lovers and literati" and gives the reason for his opinion. The literary news of the day is well given in many pages of more or less pungent and readable paragraphs.

Lovers of Kipling will be pleased to find an admirable defense of his poetry and of his claim to rank as a poet of the first class, in an article by Edward Dowden in the Critic. Phillips Brooks, who more than any other preacher, seems to have won the unanimous admiration of the literary world as well of the great every-day world in which "the man of the steeet" predominates, is the subject of an appreciative study in the form of a long review of his recently published "Life and Letters." There is a new poem by George Meredith entitled "A Reading of Life."

The Missionary Review of the World presents in this month's issue articles on the following topics: Central America as a Mission Field; The Evangelization of New York City; The Missionary Conference in Japan, and Prince Tuan's Peace Terms.

A Sensible Summer.

A Way to Obtain the Greatest Benefit For the Least Money.

A little woman went to a certain Chautauqua resort last summer, and experienced a most economical and cheerful way of living. She was at that time in a debilitated condition with poor digestion, which made it imperative that she have the right kind of food and yet such that was nourishing and strengthening, "so I took an equipment of fresh, crisp Grape-Nuts. During that summer I lived on Grape-Nuts with a little cream or milk, and some ripe fruit such as I could procure.

Many meals were made of delicious Grape-Nuts alone. I experienced a peculiar clearness of intellect, and a bodily endurance never known before on the old time diet of meats, biscuits, butter, etc.

It was a continual delight, the healthy way of living combined with simplicity, economy, and the highest utility, incurring no restaurant or board bill, and returning, at the end of the summer, with money in my pocket, realizing that I had lived sumptuously every day, for I had lived on the most perfect food known, and was renewed in health, strength and mental power, and had acquired a complexion so clear and fresh tinted, that I was termed a picture of health, and felt myself to be a happy woman."

She lives at Monmouth, Ill. Name given by Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

Our Budget.

—It is always time for the March offering until you have taken it.

—The whole month is devoted to gathering the harvest of foreign missionary offerings which ought to have been in preparation for the eleven months preceding.

—Let us not allow our missionary efforts to be spasmodic. We have special days and campaigns for the ingatherings, but missionary education and the missionary spirit should be continuous.

—J. V. Crawford will soon remove to Heppner, Ore., and will be succeeded at Enterprise, Ore., by Brother L. Green, of Athena.

—The church at Russell, Ia., of which J. L. Johnson is pastor, has decided to erect a new building and has already raised $3,000 for that purpose.

—A. A. Honeywell, of Washington C. H., O., has accepted the invitation of the church to remain indefinitely. He has already been there three years and a half and the prospects are good for a long pastorate.

—A new church at Elliott, Ia., where M. C. Johnson is pastor, was dedicated March 3 by L. L. Carpenter. The new house is the best in the city and the debt of $900 was more than provided for by the subscriptions on the dedication day.

—The church at Sumner, Ill., for which J. E. Deihl preached half time last year, would like to secure a pastor who can work for a small salary. Bro. Deihl will preach this year for the congregations at Table Grove and Ipava.

—Dr. B. B. Tyler is conducting a class for Sunday-school teachers and workers in connection with the Y. M. C. A. in Denver, Colo. The class has just been started and it is expected that it will draw a large number of all churches who are interested in Bible study.

—The church at Goff, Kan., of which L. H. Barnum is pastor, had a mortgage-burning on March 3. W. S. Lowe, superintendent of Kansas state missions, was present and there was a time of great rejoicing when the debt of eleven years' standing was wiped out.

—Edwin E. Curry recently preached the annual sermon to the Knights of Pythias at Sullivan, Ill. The church at that place, says Brother C., will greatly miss its faithful and efficient organist, Miss Helen Smyser, who goes to Fresno, Cal., as organist of the First Church in that city.

—N. H. Sheppard, secretary of the Seventh Indiana district, informs us that the missionary convention of that district will be held at Fortville, Ind., April 8-10. Electric cars run every hour from Indianapolis; distance twenty miles. An exceptionally good program has been prepared.

—A. R. Hunt, of Salina, Mo., writes: "J. A. Davis, who united with us a few weeks ago, was last Sunday granted license to preach. He has been called to preach half time each at the churches at Fillmore and Antioch and has already begun his work there."

—F. W. Burnham has been called to remain three years longer with the church at Charleston, Ill., after the expiration of his present five year pastorate, which ends next August. Bro. Burnham is a young man of admirable staying qualities and the church is wise to encourage him in a long pastorate.

—Prof. Will D. Howe, of Butler College, a frequent contributor to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, has taken the place vacated by the death of Maurice Thompson as one of the judges in a short story contest conducted by the Indianapolis News. The other judges are Booth Tarkington, author of "The Gentleman from Indiana" and Charles Major, author of "When Knighthood Was in Flower."

—"If we are to have the 'apostolic' practice of supernatural healing, I insist on a return to the apostolic scale of prices also. The apostles had no schedule of $5 a week for absent treatment or so much a week for prayers for the sick." This very pertinent suggestion comes in the course of a letter in several things from S. W. Crutcher, of Harrisonville, Mo.

—A correspondent informs us that his congregation is about to begin a protracted meeting and concludes his note by saying: "The ladies of the church gave a chicken pie social last night. Pray for us." Is this a case of a misplaced modifier, like the classic advertisement, "For Rent—Furnished room for a gentleman with a bay window"?

—The church at Stanberry, Mo., will be without a pastor after April 1, Bro. Shanklin having resigned to accept a pastorate at La Monte, Mo. The church at Stanberry has a membership of 200 and a good six-room parsonage. The town has a population of 2,700 and good schools. The church would prefer a young married man between thirty and forty years of age.

—The receipts for the first eight days of March amount to $6,140.81, a gain of $296.89 over the corresponding eight days last year. During the same time 299 churches sent offerings, a gain of forty over the same time last year. It is hoped that better reports will be shown next week In the meantime let the churches give all diligence to send liberal offerings as promptly as possible to F. M. Rains, Cor. Sec., Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio.

—The church at San Antonio, Texas, owns several pieces of valuable property which it would like to dispose of to secure money to build a house of worship. Several unsuccessful attempts to build have been made in the last few years. The property is a good investment but the church needs the money. Anyone having money to invest in first-class real estate would do well to write to Jay E. Adams, chairman ways and means committee, San Antonio.

—Z. T. Sweeney, as Commissioner of Fisheries and Game for Indiana, has recently issued a biennial report which forms an illustrated volume of about 160 pages, giving descriptions of the fishes and birds of that state and their distribution, as well as setting forth work done by the commission. The book contains an immense amount of information in regard to the birds and fishes of this latitude and the game laws both of Indiana and of many other states, and can be perused with profit by any one interested in these subjects.

—During February, the receipts for Church Extension were as follows: From churches, $24.42; from individuals, $248.35; from 20 per cent. on Americans' Day receipts, $458.78; total, $731.55. This is a loss in comparison with the receipts of February, 1900, of $947.62. However, last year, we had a gift of $1,000 in February, and no large gifts this year in the same month. At its meeting held on March 5th, the Board of Church Extension granted the following loans: La Monte, O. T., $400; Bedford, Ia., $1,000; Fife Lake, Mich., $150; Hammond, La., $500; Hazelwood, Ky., $300; Pacific Grove, Cal., $500; Third Church, Grand Rapids, Mich., $750; Roanoke, Va. (colored), $600.

Dyspepsia

Is difficult digestion, due to a weakened condition of the stomach and its inability to properly churn the food; or to unhealthy condition of the gastric juice, too much or too little acid, too much or too little pepsin.

Hood's Sarsaparilla relieves all the distressing symptoms of dyspepsia because it promotes the muscular action of the stomach and intestines, aids nature in the manufacture of her own digestive secretions, which are far better than any artificial pepsin, unlocks the bowels, stimulates the kidneys and tones up their mucous membranes.

So prompt is its effect in many cases that it seems to have almost a magic touch.

Begin to take it NOW.

Suffered Everything—"I was troubled with dyspepsia, suffered everything but death, could not eat without terrible distress. Since taking Hood's Sarsaparilla I eat heartily and I am well." MRS. EUGENE MURPHY, Danbury, Conn.

Eat Three Times a Day—"Hood's Sarsaparilla has cured me of dyspepsia and I never felt better. Can eat three good meals every day." FRED POEHLER, 437 South Penna St., Indianapolis, Ind.

—The following letter written to our Home Missionary Secretary has two commendable points: it exhibits the plan of tithing in successful operation and it lays emphasis on the necessity of pushing Home Missions. The letter is in part as follows: "Herewith please find draft for $500 as a contribution for Home Missions. In tithing my income I try to parcel the money out carefully. It seems to me that this amount should go to Home Missions at this time. I am trying to be an honest steward with the money the Lord puts into my hands. Do not mention my name but mark the contribution from 'a friend'."

—Many apparently have forgotten the address of the Board of Ministerial Relief. Some have written to us for information on this point and others have sent their contributions to us to be forwarded. We are always willing to forward money when desired, but it is just as well to send it directly. Contributions for ministerial relief should be sent to Howard Cale, 120 E. Market Street, Indianapolis, Ind. The fact that the regular time for the offering has passed should not deter any one from sending a contribution now. The important point is not the time but the contribution, and the time is always ripe until the money has been sent. We call attention herewith to the missionary directory containing the addresses of our missionary secretaries which is published elsewhere and which will be kept standing in the paper for reference.

—The Buffalo Commercial gives at some length a review of the work of the Disciples of Christ in that city, apropos of the series of meetings which has just been closed at the Jefferson Street Church. J. P. Lichtenberger, the pastor, has conducted the meetings with the result of 103 accessions. The Commercial speaks in most complimentary terms of the quiet and spiritual character of the work and praises the work of the pastor's assistant, Miss Lemmert, as the most potent force in the revival. Our people have a strong hold on Buffalo and the four pastors, Lichtenberger, Jenkins, Egbert and Chester, represent us well.

—A new organization is being formed for Christian workmen, to take the place of the existing trades unions, the operations of which contain many features which are objectionable. The proposed society will include all trades in the building line and its members will consist exclusively of men in good standing in some evangelical church. Its members will assist each other by a co-operative arrangement in securing contracts from those desiring to build, and it will provide conditions under which apprentices can learn their trades without being subjected to the usual demoralizing influences. For further particulars address H. P. B., Box 527, Chicago.

—We have so much valuable matter to print in our columns that we cannot afford the space to tell our readers in detail all about the many successful campaigns which are now going on for the extension of the circulation of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. By way, however, of quieting the fears of any who might suppose that our comparative silence on this subject indicates inactivity, we give a few figures. At Akron, O., we have obtained 70 new subscribers since Jan. 1, 1901; at Cleveland, 75; at Allegheny, 83; at Pittsburg, 58; at Omaha (including South Omaha), 140; at Buffalo, 45. Our list at Des Moines already included most of our members who can read, but even there we have secured 50 new ones since the beginning of the year. These are all bona fide subscribers, who not only take the paper but pay for it at the advertised rate. The remainder of the two pages which we might have devoted to telling about our success in each one of these places and in many others, we will devote to more edifying and generally interesting matter.

The Lexington Congress.

Railroad Rates. Since most of those from a distance will have clergy permits no other special rates will be made, except possibly in the territory near Lexington. Ministers coming from outside the Southern Passenger Association must repurchase tickets at line points such as Chicago, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh and Kansas City. Full information may be obtained from local railroad agents. Delay and inconvenience may be avoided by sending at once to the Passenger Associations for annual or trip permits through their territory.

Entertainment. The Lexington brethren are making thorough preparation to entertain the Congress. Lodging and breakfast will be given free, while other meals will be served at the church for twenty-five cents each. All intending to go should write at once to Bro. Mark Collis, Fayette Park, Lexington.

Membership. Last year it was decided to charge a fee of fifty cents for membership in the Congress. This is intended to defray all expenses and enable us to dispense with collections during the sessions. All who attend may make this payment when they enroll.

Those who do not attend may also become members by sending their names and fifty cents to the secretary, and in return they will receive copies of the daily papers during that week, containing full reports of the proceedings.

New York Letter.

At the recent State Y. M. C. A. Convention of New York, statistics were produced which give an idea of the largeness of the work that few realize. There are 164 associations in the state, with a membership of 42,523—a gain of 25,000 during the year. Their property is valued at $4,622,000 exclusive of mortgages. Maintaining the associations last year cost $539,000. Men and boys attending religious services number 366,000. Those in the Bible-classes number 120,000. The railroad branches have a membership of 10,000. They are doing all they can to raise a $1,000,000 endowment fund by the time of the Jubilee Convention which will be held at Boston in June. Dr. G. N. Vanderlip, the founder of the first association, resides in this city and though well advanced in years he expects to be at the Jubilee Convention.

Almost all the Christian people of New York regret the resignation of Dr. A. C. Dixon as pastor of the Hanson Place Baptist Church of Brooklyn. Dr. Dixon has received an urgent call from the Ruggles St. Church, Boston, one of the strongest in that city. The Hanson Place congregation in Brooklyn are doing all they can to retain Dr. Dixon as their pastor, they have laid his resignation on the table, and have appointed a committee to wait upon and induce him, if possible, to reconsider his decision to go to Boston. If he goes New York will lose one of her strongest and most popular preachers. He is popular both as pastor and as an evangelist; and the church in Brooklyn will find it difficult to fill his place.

The question of religious liberty is to be settled in a Massachusetts court of law. John B. Gale, an alumnus of Williams College, intends to bring suit against the Williams College corporation in order to determine whether the faculty has the legal right to compel students to attend religious services. The rule at Williams is that the students must attend chapel services every week day and twice each Sunday. Failure to comply with this rule means probation and expulsion. It is understood that some of this faculty favor doing away with the rule, but the president and the majority favor retaining it. Mr. Gale contends that no college or other institution has a right under the laws of Massachusetts to compel attendance upon religious services. The law of that state says that no interference shall be made by any man with another's religious worship. The decision will be awaited with much interest in many institutions of learning.

Dr. Josiah Strong in a recent address in this city said, suppose it were announced that Jesus Christ would arrive in the city to-morrow to investigate the various business enterprises of the community, how many invitations would be sent him to come and look over the books? The law of service is as applicable in the twentieth century as in ancient times. A general recognition of that law would solve the problem of labor and capital. The public holds that professional men come under the law of service—it ought to be just as true of the banker, the merchant and the laborer. There are not two standards of morals or of labor in the Bible. If the law of service is applicable to the minister and the doctor it ought to be equally applicable to the merchant and the manufacturer. The man who is in business only for the money there is in it is unworthy.

The People's Institute holds special services each Sunday evening at the Cooper Institute, under the direction of Prof. Chas. Sprague Smith. On March 3, Dr. Joseph Silverman spoke on "Wealth's Power for Evil." He said there has been built up in this country an aristocracy of wealth and men have gained positions in society to which they were not entitled by virtue of either intellectual or moral qualities. Wealth has become a power for the gratifying of personal desires, for money unlocks many doors, not only to social salons but also to halls of fame. Its power is felt at the ballot box, in the legislative hall and on the bench of justice. Those that live beyond their means to obtain social prestige, those of wealth who spend their time in social gratification, and those who oppress the poor and the helpless are alike the enemies of God and man. The highest virtue is that which comes through hard, honest work. The worship of Mammon is back of political venality, social impurity and the suffering and sorrowing of the race. Is not the love of money the root of all kinds of evil? The power of wealth gotten in righteousness is to be coveted; and when properly used it will bless the one who possesses it and the ones to whom in any way it ministers. One of the needs of the pulpit to-day is to insist upon the reality of Christian stewardship.

Nursing In Alaska.

Need of Proper Food and Care For Miners.

The character of the food used in the mining camps is such that many strong men break down under it. Scurvy is a very common disease. They drink quantities of coffee and that does its work with thousands.

A nurse, Mrs. L. Lovell, who has been employed in different places in Alaska for the past three years, writes to say that she has induced many patients to leave off coffee and take Postum Food Coffee, which is very popular now in many of the mining camps, for they have learned its value.

She says of herself that she has been a great sufferer from the use of coffee, and had a most shameful bilious complexion. She says, "I not only suffered from the looks, but had a very serious stomach trouble. When I finally quit coffee and began using Postum Food Coffee my stomach began to recover its normal condition, and my complexion gradually changed, until now, after a month or more use of Postum, my complexion is as fair as a school girl's.

I send you a list of many names of miners that have given up coffee and are using Postum, and in each case there has been a remarkable improvement in health.

I had one patient almost gone from scurvy. He could not retain any food but lived on Postum until strong enough to take other food and got well.

I am going to take up a large supply of Postum next trip."

What Will Be Done?

Many auxiliaries of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions are taking much interest in our mountain mission work. For many years the interest in this work was little, but within the past year and the last few months the interest has increased wonderfully. We make this statement because of letters of inquiry from many states. The women want to know of the work and the field.

Hazel Green Academy has had a wonderful growth recently, and signs of life and growth are still evident. Our school rooms are too much crowded. Our classes are too large. Our teachers have too much work to do. Room for our boarders is hard to find, and many are poorly cared for, or accommodated. What will be done? What we do should be done quickly.

This is the Master's business, and his work requireth haste.

We have four teachers and 254 pupils. We have one music teacher and twenty-six pupils who take music lessons. The church work continues to occupy much time. These young men and women in the academy come from a large section of the mountains, and represent nearly every class of home life. Seventy-five per cent. of the enrollment is non-resident. One hundred and twenty-six of our matriculates are boarders. We have a larger number of boarders than any other school in the mountains.

These pupils for the most part attend religious services at the Church of Christ. Since September, 1900, we have baptized fifteen of them and received into the fellowship of the church about seven others. The work being done by them is very satisfactory and their influence will be greatly felt in the coming years. More than sixty of them will teach during the summer and fall of this year in the district schools of eastern Kentucky.

We are delighted at the growth of this work in all lines, but we are hampered because of too small buildings and lack of suitable appliances for work. Supply these and we may readily enroll 500 or more pupils annually within a few years.

"What will be done?" has been asked often during the recent months. Surely, this opportunity for work in these eastern mountains of our land has been placed before us by the heavenly Father. Will we not use the opportunity? The Church of Christ may possess this whole field. Will we go up now and take it?

Congress of the Disciples.

The brethren in Lexington, Ky., will gladly welcome and entertain those attending the Congress of Disciples to be held March 26-28 in Central Christian Church, corner of Walnut and Short Streets, a few steps north of the postoffice.

All who expect to attend are urgently requested to write immediately to Bro. Mark Collis, Fayette Park, Lexington, Ky., so that upon their arrival at Central Church they may be assigned to homes where they will be provided with lodging and breakfast free.

Dinner and supper will be served near the church at 25 cents each. This plan of entertainment was observed last year at Indianapolis and was recommended by the committee on program and general arrangements. Do not fail to write Bro. Collis that you are coming, and come. I. J. SPENCER,
Chairman Local Committee.

Missouri Mission Notes.

Will the pleas for assistance never cease? Constantly new fields are opening before us. Then there is coming in a class of appeals, which, heretofore, has not been large, but which is growing very fast—churches which have been strong, but by removals and death have become weak and unless assisted must die. Very often there is much more profit in saving an already existing organization than in trying to establish a new one. The utter inability to answer every worthy appeal is, in the highest degree, sad. So often we have to say wait, but delay means loss always, and so often death, that it hurts to say it. If we could only secure the funds, what a joy it would be to help.

In the early part of February we sent to the presidents of all the county and district organizations asking for a report of their work. We received reports from Monroe, Cedar, Christian, Lincoln, Marion, Jasper, Atchison, Callaway and Laclede counties, but for some reason we have failed to connect with any of the districts, and we hereby serve notice on the presidents of these districts that we are still waiting for their reports. We are very thankful to W. N. Briney, of Monroe; F. B. Elmore, of Atchison; H. Clay Whaley, of Marion; F. J. Yokley, of Christian; W. A. Oldham and W. F. Turner, of Jasper; J. S. Stockard, of Cedar; F. G. Nichols, of Callaway; A. A. Beery and J. B. Jeans, of Laclede. Splendid work is being done in Christian and Laclede counties especially. F. J. Yokley is the moving power in the former and A. A. Beery and J. B. Jeans are the great team in the latter. Bro. Beery has not only worked up the co-operation, so that Bro. Jeans has been employed as county evangelist, but now offers himself for a meeting, "where I can do the most good." Bro. Yokley, after raising the means to employ an evangelist in Christian county and putting him to work, now relinquishes a good church, for one Lord's day in the month, and picks out the "hard places" in which to hold meetings in that time. Now let us hear from the other counties.

Down in Jasper county Bro. W. F. Turner, who has the tremendous task of building an immense church house, yet finds time to secure a young man, Bro. C. W. Shull, to work in Joplin and vicinity to build up the cause of Christ. The new men that have gone into the South Missouri field, and nearly all through the persuasion of your secretary, are filling that part of Missouri with the spirit of missions. I have two letters received in the last month from young ministers now living in south Missouri, who after looking over the field and seeing its awful needs, have determined to give themselves to its redemption. They both will make great sacrifices to this end, not only by discomforts, absence from home, loneliness, etc., but in actual money. Can we complacently see such men doing such things and aid them not? Is our duty done when we fold our hands and say "God bless them"? May the dear Lord help us to see our duty too. T. A. ABBOTT.

Missouri Bible-School Notes.

West Line is one of the Missouri churches that has done much toward preparing workers for other communities, their Bible-school being above the average in this work. W.H. Cook's meeting helped greatly last fall and by effort, the funds are on hand for his continuance. H. R. Wells will be missed here, but in our work Mrs. Mattie Stevenson and the school are seeing that there is no falling behind.

Walnut Grove, Warren county, is now organized for school work and with Warrenton, gives us two schools in this great German element. Good seed is being put into the hearts of some of this element and even now good results are manifest, and it is the only way to evangelize these people.

R. B. Havener met with a hearty reception in his chart work at Marshfield and Richland, the friends manifesting their appreciation by taking up the work for following after his departure and by their offering to his support.

At Spring Grove, Wright county, Brother Giddens has just closed his work, resulting in nine additions, the organization of a new Bible-school, and something like $600 in money toward a new house. The opposition was such that an officer had to be present every night of the meeting.

Cleveland and W. C. Edwards gave glad welcome to your secretary. A. A. Noyes is one of the old men in this work. The brethren here are taking one-half of W. H. Cook's time this year and are much elated over his labors with and for them.

The new house at Tavern, built under the oversight of Bro. Giddens, is nearing completion and he will dedicate it some time in March.

East Lynne and John W. Boulton are always in readiness for us; while Mrs. Mattie Ammons and the children have taken in hand the award of merit cards, hoping for a fine report at Sedalia.

With all this work LaBelle is in full co-operation, but this year's rally was far beyond the ordinary. R. Minter had put some business energy into getting up the program; A. D. Bourn saw to the music, D. L. Bourn to the drill and the school force gave full support to all their efforts, so that every feature was a success. LaBelle is in the lead this year, and J. H. Coil is happy.

Our churches are busy with the March offering. It is too early yet to give all the results, but a fair beginning has been made. Central has cash and pledges for this great work of world-wide evangelization of over $400. Mt. Cabanne has $406, $100 of which is conditioned on the raising of a total of $500. Fourth and Beulah have more than met their apportionments. The missionary rally held on the 20th of February, while but poorly attended, was, nevertheless, an encouragement to the churches participating.

T. P. Haley, "the Bishop of Missouri," is rendering valuable assistance in a meeting at the First Church, where F. O. Fannon ministers. Bro. Haley has many friends of auld lang syne in this city; he has known four generations of some families, and his wide acquaintance and popularity make him a tower of strength. He speaks with unabated force and cogency.

"A Religious Assembly" was commenced at Mt. Cabanne Church, Sunday, March 10. The pastor is doing the preaching and Prof. H. A. Easton, of Chicago, is conducting the music. This church was planted less than ten years ago, and its remarkable growth is a striking illustration of the tremendous advantage of a favorable location. A good preacher is a good thing, but a good location is better than a whole seminary of preachers. The building is already inadequate and has just been enlarged again by the removal of a partition between the lecture room and the auditorium, giving a seating capacity of between six and eight hundred. Recently a men's club was organized with thirty-eight charter members and a young people's department in the Sunday school with forty members.

T. P. Haley never said a thing which recent history demonstrates more clearly than when he remarked: "The problem before us in the cities is not the establishment of churches: that is comparatively easy: but their maintenance." The growth of a great church must be simultaneous with the growth of the city. Or at least it must become, by force of numbers or weight of character, an integral part of the community. And it is a question of years, not to say generations.

West End Church is growing into better things. Carondelet is weathering some rough seas, but nothing which is unusual in the early life of a church. E. J. Lampton's meeting will be of material help to this little band. The quarterly district convention of the C. W. B. M. of this district will be held at Mt. Cabanne March 22, 10 A. M. to 4 P. M. W. A. Moore is in great favor with his flock and the community in general, and we look for the continued rapid growth of Beulah.

Kansas Mission Notes.

We spent Sunday, March 1, at Goffs. We witnessed the burning of the mortgage which has been a burden for twelve years. L. H. Barnum is pastor.

W. H. Scrivner held a good meeting at Garden City. Not many added, local conditions prevented a large ingathering, but in general the meeting was helpful to the church.

L. S. Ridenour is at Allen, Lyon co., under the auspices of the Lyon co. co-operation. A smallpox scare is hindering the progress of the meeting.

M. Ingels will begin a meeting at Princeton in a few days.

G. M. Read is at Centropolis reorganizing and getting things in order. From there he goes to Crandall, then to Arcadia.

P. H. Guy will assist Bro. Morris at Galena in the near future. Bro. Guy has had excellent success this winter.

The church at Garnett is rejoicing over the meeting held by Sister Hazelrigg and R. A. Adamson. About forty additions in all. They will now employ a pastor for full time.

March is the month in which the money for the second quarter for Kansas missions is due. The money is badly needed. The board has done and is under obligations to do more work in needy fields than at any previous time.

Bro. Scrivner is now at Perry for the purpose of holding a meeting and, if possible, organizing. The board has promised financial aid.

The board should render assistance in the meeting to be held by Sister Hazelrigg at Concordia in April.

In order to meet our present and past obligations we should receive not less than four hundred dollars this month, from the Kansas field. Shall we have it? The answer must come from the churches, Bible-schools and C. E. societies.

All obligations could be met if what is now due was paid.

Come to our aid, brethren and sisters.

W. S. LOWE.

1221 Clay St., Topeka, Kan.

Nebraska Secretary's Letter.

The students at Cotner are conducting a revival at the chapel, which is developing great spiritual power, with accessions each service. Bro. Sumpter is pastor.

Atwood reports nine additions at Exeter in first ten days. A case of smallpox has created quite a scare, and the meeting may not be allowed to continue.

Beem and Hackett are at Craig.

The Unadilla meeting had 28 additions, and money raised for pastor the next year. W. T. Hacker preaches for them.

The Fairfield meeting has closed with evangelists, but Pastor Hussong held another meeting and had three additions, making 60 all told. This is a rousing meeting for this church, and gives them a membership of 267.

J. E. Wilson reports the Chadron work moving along, with one confession on the 24th of February.

The Falls City meeting gathers strength as it goes. People turned away from the house for lack of room. Twenty-nine additions at last report, Feb. 26. Bro. Vawter is designated as "a great preacher."

Bro. Ogden closed at Norman on the 3d of March, though the final results are not at hand. He has been in the needy fields, and his work has been that of preserving the things we had rather than getting in new members. It is to his praise that good words come from his work wherever he goes. He expected to spend a few days at Bethany, his home, before commencing at Cowles.

The Bible-schools that did not observe Rally Day are coming to the front with their apportionments. The C. E. Societies should fall into line at once, and do their part. They are much behind the record of last year.

District No. 3 is in the lead this year in the matter of apportionments, and the secretary is trying to keep it there. If No. 5 is not awake to its opportunities there is likely to be a loss of prestige.

The superintendent of Bible-schools and C. E. Societies is out with circular letters urging the apportionments. His call should be heeded. Opportunities for work in the needy fields are slipping away. What we ought to do, is becoming impossible to do.

Reports from the churches in this state indicate a better growth than has been enjoyed for years. The present management of our missionary forces is helping our churches into growing conditions. We hope soon to demonstrate to our Home Missionary Board that money invested in Minnesota is not thrown away. Though the weakest of the great religious bodies represented in the state, we receive far less missionary help than others. The Congregationalists, one of the strongest bodies in the state, receive four times the help from their Home Board that we receive from ours. Yet our percentage of increase exceeds theirs.

I was called to Jordan, Minn., March 2, to preach the funeral sermon of Mrs. Eva Cragun. She was the wife of James Cragun, and was a member of the Belle Plain Church. She was widely known among our people in the state. Her parents and their children, as well as all the Cragun's, are staunch Disciples. Her maiden name was Harris. She was born at Herman, Wis., Dec. 17, 1852. Her parents came to Minnesota in 1854. She became a Christian in 1868; was married in 1875. She was a saintly character. All who knew her loved her, and regarded her as a most remarkable woman for purity of life and refinement of spirit.

The Minnesota Christian Ministerial Association will hold its next meeting with the First Christian Church of St. Paul, April 3-4. The program for the occasion is as follows:

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 3.

1:30 P. M.—Introductory service led by President H. T. Sutton, of Redwood Falls. Character of Pastor and Congregation.—R. M. Ainsworth, of Garden City. The Pastor and the Pastorate.—W. W. Divine, of Eden Valley. The Pastor and Evangelist.—W. H. Knotts, of Litchfield. Conference—led by J. H. Carr, of Concord.

7:30 P. M.—Address by E. A. Orr.

THURSDAY, APRIL 4.

9:00 A. M.—The Blood Covenant.—J. K. Shellenberger, of Madelia. Discussion—led by Leslie Wolf, of Amboy. Pulpit Preparation.—M. B. Ainsworth, of Duluth. Discussion—led by J. E. Hood, of Canby A Study of Second Timothy.—H. T. Sutton, of Redwood Falls.

1:30 P. M.—The Man and His Message.—John Treloar, of Austin. The Human Soul and Some of its Possibilities.—Henry Goodacre, of Redwood Falls. Is Christianity an Evolution or a Revelation?—A. D. Harmon, of St. Paul.

7:30 P. M.—Address by C. J. Tanner, of Minneapolis.

All our Minnesota preachers should be there. The St. Paul church, A. D. Harmon, pastor invites us all and will treat us so well that we will feel that it was good to be there.

Mankato has just received $40,000 from Mr. Andrew Carnegie for a city library. We already have a small city library, but with the addition of the new library and a fine library building we will have one of the largest and finest libraries in the west outside of the largest cities.

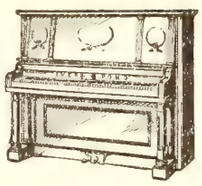
Hamburg, Ia., Mar. 5.—Closed a meeting here with 39 additions. J. M. Hoffman, of Boone, Ia., did the preaching. This makes us 250 strong in one year. Bro. Hoffman did us a good work and will be remembered kindly by all who heard him preach.—H. W. CIES, pastor.



Lenox, Ia., Mar. 5.—W. E. Harlow has just concluded the most helpful meeting this small town has ever had. Additions 57; baptisms 47, from previous relation 5, immersed sectarians 5.—R. J. SMITH

Pleasantville, Ia., Mar. 7.—Am just trying to close a great meeting here with Bro. F. D. Ferrall, one of God's noblemen. He has done a great work during his three years' ministry. He will probably leave here after this year, in July he closes. The church that secures him will be fortunate. Confessions every night except one for three weeks.—H. C. PATTERSON.

Seymour, Ia., Mar. 5.—Closed four weeks' work in the employ of Wapalo Co. co-operations; the time was all put in at Zion, five miles southwest of Ottumwa. There was no organization there. An organization of 33 was the result; 21 baptized, 12 who had been. We organized Sunday-school and arranged for regular work one fourth time.—D. L. AMMONS, county evangelist.

CHURCH ORGANS: If you are about to buy a new organ for your church it will pay you to write to me about it. I have no organs to sell, nor do I represent any manufacturer or dealer. I am a Purchasing Agent. If you will tell me about how much you can pay for an organ, how and where it is to be used, etc., I can select you a better organ, and one better adapted to your needs, than you could select. Moreover, I can save you about 10 per cent on the price of the instrument and I charge you nothing for my services. I have had many years' experience with organs, both as dealer and organist, and I offer you, gratis, the benefit of my experience in assisting you to select either an organ for your church, or an organ or piano or any other musical instrument for the home. Address Arthur O. Garrison, 1522 Locust St., St. Louis, Mo.

Drexel, Mo.—We have just closed one of the best meetings ever held here. It was held at the Christian church and lasted six weeks. All the churches of the town were invited to take part and revive the spiritual condition of all the churches of the town. We threw open the doors for the people to come and make the confession and then unite with any church that was their choice. There had not been a conversion in the town in eighteen months, and not more than ten in the last three years. The preaching was done by the writer and the work was done by the workers of the different churches working together. All barriers were thrown out of the way and the churches went to work in earnest to save the town. Those who made the good confession became workers at once and solicited others to come with them. In order that we might avoid all possibility of friction at the close of the meeting, each evening at the close of the service we took the name of each person making the good confession and the church they desired to unite with. Then at the close of the meeting each pastor took charge of his members. The visible results of the meeting were as follows: The town is "dry." All of the whisky's were shipped out of it during the meeting. The gambling places were all broken up, and there were 102 added to the churches. Of this number, four went to the M. P. Church; eight to the M. E. Church; nine to the Presbyterian Church; 18 to the Baptist Church, and 61 to the Christian Church. There was love and harmony throughout the entire meeting, and now we are living in a new town.—O. A. ISHMAEL.

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

Family Circle.

John the Baptist.

The last and greatest Herald of Heaven's King,
Girt with rough skins, hies to the deserts wild,
Among the savage brood the woods forth bring,
Which he more harmless found than man, and mild.
His food was locusts and what there doth spring,
With honey that from virgin hives distilled;
Parched body, hollow eyes, some uncouth thing
Made him appear, long since from earth exiled.
There burst he forth: "All ye whose hopes rely
On God, with me amidst these deserts mourn,
Repent, repent, and from old errors turn!"
Who listened to his voice, obeyed his cry?
Only the echoes, which he made relent,
Rung from their flinty caves, Repent! Repent!

W. Drummond, 1585-1649.

Economic Value of the Belgian Hare.

The Belgian hare culture is now fairly launched in several states as a growing industry. It has engrossed the attention of a large number of people in California and Colorado for several years, and thousands of dollars are invested in it. Many look upon it as a "fad" or "craze" and wonder why it creates such an intense interest wherever it is known. There are good and sufficient reasons for this. No other domestic animal has a history so brief that records such great and sweeping triumphs as this gentle little creature. As a meat producer it stands at the head, not only on account of the superb quality but also for quantity. Being dainty in habit, its flesh is more wholesome than chicken and of fine flavor; is not oily like turkey or duck and has none of the wild flavor of the common rabbit. It can be eaten with safety and relish by the most delicate convalescent. It furnishes more nutriment than beef, pork or mutton. More than this, it produces so much meat at so little cost and labor, that it is valuable from an economic standpoint. One doe will easily rear from forty to fifty in a year and as they can be bred when but six months old, one hundred as the increase from a single doe is a fair possibility. The meat brings from 15 to 20 cents a pound in the retail markets, thus insuring enormous profit on the investment. It is not a new enterprise in Europe, as the hare has been used on the table for fifty years or more. In France alone 60,000,000 are sold annually, 30,000,000 in England, 4,000,000 in Belgium. It is an attractive business for women who are usually successful fanciers. The work is light and can be conducted without interfering with other duties. Boys are always enthusiastic breeders and as it provides employment that is remunerative and wholesome, parents are quick to see the advantage of establishing their boys in it. Many boys twelve years of age take care of large rabbitries without interfering with their school in any way.

The laboring man is interested in it, even though he should not care to raise more than for his own consumption. They can be kept in a shed or boxes, thus enabling him to provide his family with savory and nourishing food at small cost and labor. While we do not claim that the Belgian hare will encroach on the domain of the faithful hen, it will become a profitable adjunct to poultry raising both for home consumption and the market. Many have conceived the idea that they will become a nuisance as the rabbit at one time was in Australia. But that is impossible. In the first place people will not turn them loose since they have a good market value, and should any gain their liberty they would be utterly unable to care for themselves, as has been proven. They are in every sense a made breed and now so long domesticated would be unsuccessful in a fight for existence with a wild hare.

Will Belgian hare raising be overdone? Not in this country of meat consumers. On the Pacific coast, where they are extensively raised, the market has never been nearly supplied. Large plants are being established for canning the meat and canned and potted hare will, in time, be as familiar on the shelves of the grocer as the numerous other canned meats now so largely used. MRS. H.

Central African Fashions.

Bangles, necklaces and belts made of fine copper are commonly worn as ornaments by the native tribes of Central Africa. Miss Caddick, in her delightful account of her journey in Central Africa, describes the ingenious way in which the natives manufacture the wire from the rough copper. They draw it into the finest possible strands, which they twist on hair.

The men cut a hole through a tree, into which they put a piece of iron with a small perforation in it. The strip of copper is tapered to a point and put through the hole in the iron. The natives catch hold of the end with a kind of pincers; then a good number of them hang on to it and pull it through. This process is repeated through smaller holes in the iron, till the wire is fine enough.

All the ornaments are beautifully made, and the wire is extremely fine and flexible. Some of the men wear five copper wire belts, "manyetas," as they are called, which fit the body very tightly. The manyetas are very difficult to buy, and I was at first puzzled to account for this. After a time I came to understand that the belts, being so small, were extremely difficult to get off. The poor men required time, and were obliged to use a good deal of oil before they could wriggle out of them.

These manyetas are very heavy, and the weight and size greatly astonished me, as natives usually seem to dislike wearing anything tight or heavy. But fashion, in Africa, as in England, makes martyrs. The women wear thick brass wire coiled round and round their arms from wrist to elbow, and in the same way around their necks in a deep collar, which must be heavy and uncomfortable.—Youth's Companion.

Giving, Still She Had.

In Connecticut, a few years ago, we are told, there lived a lady who had a beautiful flower garden in which she took great pride. The whole neighborhood was proud of it, too, and people drove miles to see it. She fastened two large baskets on the outside of her fence next the road, and every morning these were filled with cut flowers—the large, showy kinds in one basket and the delicate, fragile kinds in the other. All the school children going by helped themselves, and studied the better for it: and business men took a breath of fragrance into their dusty offices, which helped the day along. Even the tramps were welcome to all the beauty they could get into their forlorn lives.

"You cut such quantities," someone said to her; "aren't you afraid that you will rob yourself?"

"The more I cut the more I have," she answered. "Don't you know that if plants are allowed to go to seed, they stop blooming? I love to give pleasure, and it is profit as well, for my liberal cutting is the secret of my beautiful garden. I am like the man in 'Pilgrim's Progress'—the more I give away the more I have."

This is a rule that holds good in other places besides a garden. God is showing us continually that the more we give the more we have. The more we love others the more we are loved ourselves, and the teaching of the Scripture is constantly fulfilled: "There is that scattereth and yet increaseth."—Raleigh Christian Advocate.

In Washington's Day.

When Washington was President,
He saw full many an icicle:
But never on a railroad went,
And never rode a bicycle.

He read by no electric lamp,
Nor heard about the Yellowstone;
He never licked a postage stamp,
And never saw a telephone.

His trousers ended at the knees,
By wire he could not send dispatch;
He filled his lamp with whale oil grease,
And never had a match to scratch.

But in these days it's come to pass,
All work is with such dashing done.
We've all these things; but then—alas!—
We seem to have no Washington.

The Way to be Popular.

The depreciation of kindness in private life, which is one of the features of our day, is very largely due to the fashion of intellectualism; but yet human nature below the surface of crazes and phrases remains the same, and his fellows still judge a man by his heart rather than by his head. When the jury is selected, not from a coterie, but from the market place, the person who is kind will ever be preferred to the person who is clever; and "thoughtful," to use a cant word of our day, is still less than warm-hearted. Walter Scott and Dickens will ever have a larger hold upon the people than Hardy and Meredith, not because their art is finer, but because their spirit is kindlier. An affectionate child is more welcome than those monsters of modern precocity who furnish their foolish parents with saying for quotation, and who have worn out all healthy sensations at the age of 10. The girl who is honest, unaffected, considerate, good-natured, still receives the prize of respect and of love. No young man is better liked than he who has a genuine interest in the aged and in little children, in the poor lads and in weak people.—Ian Maclaren in The Christian Endeavor World.

Only a Button.

It was trifling value—only a button—but it served as an index to character.

Among ten or twelve raftsmen was a 15-year-old boy. They were "laying by," that being the raftsman's expression for waiting for the water in the river, which was then "too high for running," to "fall," so they could proceed down with their rafts to market.

They were hardy, uncouth, large-hearted, fearless mountaineers; coarsely attired, some of them even ragged, but as hopeful and independent as if they owned all the rafts on the river. The five or six days during which they had to "lay by" were spent in various ways—pitching horseshoes, jumping, wrestling, "playing mumbly-peg," and climbing to the top of the great crags which overlooked the river and its valley.

One day, while in the barroom of the hotel at which they were stopping, one of the young men whose coat was much the worse for wear and entirely buttonless, remarked that if he only had a button he could sew it on and make himself much more comfortable.

The 15-year-old boy, without saying a word, took out his knife and cut the lower button from his own single breasted coat, and, handing it over, said: "Here, here is a button; I have enough left on my coat without it."

The young man accepted it with thanks, and at once proceeded to sew it on his coat; and the boy had no thought of having done anything praiseworthy.

But an elderly, philosophic Englishman, who was one of the "crew," seated near by, and who had thoughtfully witnessed the whole performance, came forward now, and, laying his hand upon the boy's shoulder, remarked, "My boy, that act is an index to your character; and I was just thinking, if our young Americans are so bound together by mutual regard that they will cut their buttons from their coats to help each other out of a tight place, this country can defy the armies of the world."

Yes, it was only a button, but it indicated a willingness of heart to sacrifice for the comfort of others, and that, after all, is the marrow of the Spirit of the Lord Jesus. He came into the world, not to glorify himself, but to lay down his life for the world.—The Religious Telescope.

Johnny Apple-seeds.

The man who bore this peculiar nickname has been honored with a monument to his memory, erected at Mansfield, Ohio. His name was Jonathan Chapman, and he was born in Springfield, Mass., in 1775. The peculiarity which won him his nickname was the planting of apple-seeds, which he began before leaving Massachusetts.

He came to the west at an early day and it is said that he brought with him down the Ohio river a cargo of apple-seeds with which to plant nurseries. His first nursery was planted nine miles below Steubenville, Ohio. After planting several nurseries along the Ohio, he extended his operations westward, making pilgrimages in various directions with his apple-seeds and trees, and when the early settlers could not pay the "fippenny bit" he charged, he would trust them or take pay in clothing. He usually located his nurseries along the streams, surrounding them with brush fences, so that the early settlers would find orchards when they moved.

It was in the days of the Indians, and he lived at peace with them. He never carried any weapon, and seemed to be on good terms with the wolves and other wild animals of the forest.

He died in Indiana in 1845, and was buried at the foot of a natural mound near Fort Wayne.

"Johnny Apple-seeds'" peculiarity suggests a very commendable trait. Planting apple-seeds for other people's eating by and by may not be pecuniarily profitable, but it blesses others. Some people will do nothing unless they are paid in cash on the spot; others will do good for future generations. Sowing for others' reaping has its reward.

Better Than a Fence.

In "A Sportswoman in India" Miss Savory writes entertainingly of the monkeys in the foot-hills of the Himalayas. For cool impudence and audacity, she says, these hill-monkeys stand unrivaled; they slip into the bungalows at Dalhousie, and carry off anything from the breakfast- or tea-table, if the room is empty. They spring from tree to tree, from house to house—a mother, it may be, with two young ones clinging to her, a loaf of bread in one hand and a bunch of bananas in her mouth, which she had just "sneaked" from the dining-room.

"Of course monkeys are very troublesome in plantations. Few men can shoot a monkey; they are too human-like and pathetic when wounded. We met an Englishman who was trying to protect his sugar-cane patch with a great trench and a palisade covered with nails. All to no purpose.

"He walked down to it one morning and found a row of monkeys seated on the palisade. The moment he came within reach they threw his own sugar-cane into his face, after which they got down and strolled away, leisurely munching.

"Such things were not to be borne. Our friend chased a flock into a tree, felled the tree, and caught four or five young monkeys. The parents waited near, in great consternation, anxiously watching while their infants were painted from head to foot with treacle and tartar emetic. On being allowed to go, they rushed off into the fond and welcoming arms, and were instantly carried up into the woods, and there assiduously licked clean from top to toe by their affectionate parents.

"The natural effects followed, and the pitiable condition of the old monkeys can scarcely be imagined. That patch of sugar-cane was never rifled again."—Youth's Companion.

Little Tommy Smith.

Dimpled-cheeked and rosy-lipped,
With his cap rim backward tipped,
Still in fancy I can see Little Tommy smile on me—
—Little Tommy Smith.

Little unsung Tommy Smith—
Scarce a name to rhyme it with:
Yet most tenderly to me
Sometimes sings unceasingly—
—Little Tommy Smith.

On the verge of some far land
Still forever does he stand,
With his cap rim rakishly
Tilted; so he smiles on me—
—Little Tommy Smith.

Oh, my jaunty statuette
Of first love, I see you yet:
Though you smile so mistily,
It is but through tears I see
—Little Tommy Smith.

But with crown tipped back behind,
And the glad hand of the wind
Smoothing back your hair, I see
Heaven's best angel smile on me—
—Little Tommy Smith.

White House Domestic Management.

The President of the United States has no advantage over any ordinary citizen when it comes to hiring a cook or settling grocery bills. There is no official chef connected with the White House, or any appropriation to buy oatmeal and beefsteak. Mr. McKinley gets his house rent free and he has the use of the china and silverware, as well as the furniture which he finds on the premises; the rest he must provide out of his salary of $50,000 a year. There is an office force of clerks in the Executive Mansion and half a dozen doorkeepers and a fireman, all of whom are paid by the government, but the only government employee connected with the President's private establishment is the steward, who receives a yearly salary of $1,800. The position is a rather responsible one, and the incumbent is under a heavy bond; he is held accountable for all the movable property connected with the President's official residence and at the end of every year must give a written account of each article. This includes china, bric-a-brac, and even the common crockery and the tin plates used in the kitchen. If any of the tableware is broken the pieces must be produced; and it is the custom to send them to an auction shop, in their damaged condition, and sell them to the highest bidder. Worn-out carpets, window curtains and similar furnishings are disposed of in the same way. Experience has shown that the mere fact of association with the White House gives these second-hand articles a greatly enhanced value, and an old bottle or dish which has done duty on the President's table will sell to a collector for more than it cost when new. This is particularly true of tableware which has some distinguishing mark upon it, as a broken plate from one of the state sets, with the portrait of the President and the official coat of arms.

The Executive Mansion really consists of two separate establishments, one public and the other private. For the public section, a carriage is provided, and when the President is acting as the administrative officer of the government and wishes to go from the office of the White House to some other office or department, on government business, he is at liberty to use the official White House carriage. But when he goes driving for pleasure he does so at his own expense.

The same rule applies in the entire domestic economy of the President's official residence. He hires and pays all the servants, from Mrs. McKinley's maid to the assistant washer of dishes. As a matter of convenience, however, the general management of these affairs is intrusted to the steward. The present incumbent is a colored man, William T. Sinclair, who was brought to Washington by President Cleveland, and who has proved himself so efficient that he has been retained in office. He is said to be as "canny" as a Scotsman, and he looks after things with an eye of exceeding thrift.

It is Mr. Sinclair who does the marketing for the President's table. He owns a horse and a light road-wagon, and every morning before the sun is up he climbs into his rig and drives to one of the markets and to the various greengrocer and butcher shops. He feels the bones in the chickens' breasts, thumps the watermelons to test their ripeness and keeps a wary eye on the huckster while he picks out his best green corn and tenderest celery.

The President's family being small, the McKinley table is seldom laid for more than six people. There are a few friends who drop in informally and there are generally one or two visitors at the Executive Mansion. Mr. McKiney is a hearty eater and is particularly fond of fruits. Meat is served for breakfast, which is eaten at 8:30 in the morning; luncheon is at 1:30, and consists of fruit, tea, cold meats, hot biscuits, and possibly a souffle or some similar dish. Dinner is at six o'clock and generally consists of the four ordinary courses—soup, fish, meat, with an entree and salad and dessert. After dinner the President sits on the veranda at the rear of the White House and smokes a cigar. Then he returns to business and keeps at it until nearly midnight.

The cost of running Mr. McKinley's table, exclusive of the state banquets, is said on good authority to be less than $3,000 a year. The official functions are heavy items of expense in the President's domestic economy. One of the big formal dinners, where sixty-four guests are entertained, will cost nearly $1,000. Even the cut flowers have to be paid for by the President, the White House conservatories not yielding enough for such occasions.

In spite of all extra expense the President seldom has occasion to spend his entire salary. With his quiet habits of life and devotion to work, Mr. McKinley will probably save more than most of his predecessors.—H. G. Gardiner in the Saturday Evening Post.

A Courteous Judge.

A young lady, spending a rainy evening at the house of an old gentleman, wanted a cab to take her home. Her host started off to fetch the cab.

"Do let the maid go," she said.

"My, dear, the maid is also a woman," was the grave reply.

The man was the late George Higginbotham, chief justice of Victoria. His courtesy to woman was regardless of rank or personal attractiveness. He would take off his hat to his cook and bow to her as graciously as though she were a duchess.

A man was trying to lead a heavy draught-horse along the street. The animal refused to be led, and then the man made several ineffectual attempts to mount the refractory animal. At that moment the chief justice came along, and, seeing the man's difficulty, extended his hand—as a mounting-block.

The man put his foot in the hand and mounted upon the horse's back, and the chief justice passed on.

His courtesy made his manners good, but did not soften his sense of justice. A lawyer tells this anecdote:

"I had once to appear before him in chambers on behalf of a charming client who had some property but would not pay her debts. The case was heard in his own room, and he was courtesy itself. He stood when she entered. I think she dropped her handkerchief, and he left his seat to pick it up. Nothing could be gentler than his manner, and I was congratulating myself on an easy victory; but when the facts were heard, the decision came that my client must pay or spend six months in prison."

Underground New York.

"Underground Rome" is a term famous in literature for its revelation of the lives and deaths, hopes and comforts of the early Christians in the Catacombs. Underground New York is an interesting study of the intense life of to-day. What is buried is not dead. It is often more intense for being buried. Coming to an uncovered manhole in the street, I looked down into a gallery, in which a stooped man might walk, running through nearly every street of this vast city. On one side were seventeen lead pipes, a little less than two inches in diameter. In each pipe were 404 wires for telephonic purposes. They were put down in sections of about 400 feet, and at each junction all the separate wires had to be spliced so as to make 6,868 continuous wires. At each large building a cable of more or less wires was carried under the pavement to the inside and telephones attached as need required. Here there was a capacity for 13,738 people to be talking through that whispering gallery and yet no sound be audible. How they can keep these wires from being tangled and being spliced to uncongenial partners, so as to take the whisperings of love into meat markets and boiler shops, one can hardly imagine.

Under the same pavement is a vast system of sewer pipes, water pipes two or three feet in diameter, gas pipes, steam pipes for heating a square mile of buildings, and electric cables to furnish power for cars. These last have to cross each other at street corners, and yet keep their own electricity. They are alive with power so anxious to get back to eqilibrium that it is willing to drive a car at fearful speed with a couple of hundred people on board to do it. This power must be kept from taking short cuts back on the other cables.

Now comes a most difficult problem for underground New York. An underground railway is projected, excavating its trench. All this tangle of sewers, pipes and wires is brought to light. They must be supported by chains to trusses in the street till the excavation is complete, and then they must all be turned out of the path of the subway and laid in place and continuous effectiveness on one side or below. When we consider that miles and miles of this railway must be blasted out of solid micaceous schist rock, we see the difficulties and triumphs of underground New York.—Bishop Warren.

PETE.

XII.—Arthur Tells a Story!

When Edgar had departed, Madge winked at Linda May and said, "Girls, let's play Hide and Seek." "All right," said Linda May, although she didn't understand the entire meaning of the wink. "I'll break up," said Madge, which is "I'll hide my eyes," translated into modern language. "This tree's the base; hurry and scoot out while I count a hundred." Madge stood with her hands against the rough bark of the tree, and her forehead buried in her hands. There was a momentary flutter of skirts and then Madge stood alone in the yard. "Bushel wheat bushel clover," she presently shouted. "All ain't hid can't hide over anybody ten feet base caught here I come!" Then she left the tree on tiptoe and started around one corner of the house. Just as she reached the corner, Letitia came flying around the other corner. "Well, I don't care," said Madge, not trying to beat her to the tree, " 'fide caught you, you'd stopped playing, anyway!" Letitia did not dispute this truth, but patted the tree crying "One two three fummee!" Madge now tried the other corner of the house, whereupon Pete and Linda May came around the first and gained the base. All were in free but Eliza Bimby. They stood around the base. Madge said, "Linda May, whad jew wink at me for?"

"Why, you see," said Madge, looking wicked and half-whispering, "we can't talk free, or have any fun 'slongs that Bimby girl is here. If we can get her to be IT, we'll hide in Mr. Pendleton's woodpile where she'll never find us, and just wait there till she's gone home!" Pete began to caper about with delight at this base plot. "We'll start down the other road," said Madge, "so she'll think we're going east—'cause she always peeks, you know—and then double around behind the barn and crawl through the barbwire fence and gain the woodpile." "I tell you what we'll do," said Letitia, "you go hunt her, but if we see her running in, we'll begin to sing 'Just as the Sun Went Down,' and you'll know that means to rush in to the base and beat her."

"No," said Linda May, "le's play fair and give her ev'ry chance; then if Madge catches her, we won't feel anything but right." "That's so," said Madge, and she crept around the corner of the house. The other girls perched on the fence and waited—except Linda May, whose aunt Dollie had forbidden perching. Madge circled entirely around the house, without seeing so much as a shoe-string of Eliza. "She's hid terrible good," complained Pete. "I'll bet she's broken the rules and sneaked into the house!" As if in answer to this accusation, certain broken, whanging, excruciating sounds issued from the parlor; yes, Eliza was thumping upon the piano. An accusing shout arose from the players. Eliza looked out of the window and said, "I'm not playing this time." Then she went back and tortured the piano. There was an indignant silence in the yard, then Madge said briefly, "Woodpile!" A few minutes later four girls, namely, Madge, Linda May, Pete and Letitia, were crouching in a little recess in the very heart of a great pile of wood; perhaps I should have named Letitia first, since it was her father's woodpile. To get to this hollow place you had to wiggle and climb, but it paid for the trouble. It was just like a little room, being completely roofed over, with three sides and only a small opening leading to a kind of hallway through which they had crawled. You could see the daylight broken up into little slices and triangles by the irregular cordwood. They could sit up nearly straight. "My shoe's untied," said Madge. "My garter won't stay up," said Pete, grasping at it vindictively. "I got a tear in my apron," said Letitia ruefully: "I ought to known better than to come into such a rough place. I don't think this is the place for nice girls." "Oh!" said Linda May softly, "I think it's splendid. I'd like to sleep here all night. There comes Eliza out of the house. Listen at her calling." "Listen at her!" echoed Pete, chuckling. Eliza called and called. Then she went back in the house. "I feel mean," said Madge. "Sody I," said Pete, "but it's a awful good kind of mean feeling." "Girls," said Letitia, "le's go tell her where we are; my dress is getting all crunkled." "All Letitia thinks of is her dresses," said Pete scornfully. "If she don't look out her mind will turn into a wardrobe. Oh, there's a spider."

"I wonder if he has had any fly to-day?" said Linda May, getting out of his way. "Oh, kill it, kill it!" cried Letitia, "it's coming this way!" "I ain't going to kill it," said Madge, "they mash so. Keep still. There's Eliza coming out of the house with her hat on. She's going home. Look at her staring all around for us. I bet you she's hopping!" "That's what she gets for running away from us," said Pete, "to pound the piano. She ran away from us, and we ran away from her." "Yes," said Letitia, "but we were going to run off from her if she hadn't. But let her go!" Just then Arthur came out of Mr. Pendleton's and saw Eliza. "What's the matter, Eliza?" he called. ("That's just like Arthur," said Letitia. "He'd soon talk to one set as another. He even makes friends with people's dogs.") "I'm going home," said Eliza Bimby. "The girls have run away from me." Arthur called back, "I'll bet they're hid in the woodpile. You just wait till I see!" ("Oh!" said Madge, "he ought to have his neck wrung!") "All right," said Eliza, sitting down on the porch-steps. ("She's no more spirit than a kitten," whispered Pete with disgust; "I'd go home, in her place, and horses couldn't keep me from it!") Arthur Pendleton marched toward the woodpile. "Now you might as well come right out of there!" he called in great good humor. "I know your tricks. Come on Madge! Come on Letitia! Pete! Linda May! They's no use to wait till I come for you!" ("I wish I had a slingshot," whispered Madge; "if I wouldn't pepper him through this hole!") "Get 'em out, Arthur," called Eliza, "roust 'em!" Arthur knew the hallway that led into the secret chamber. It wasn't long before he crawled to the narrow door. "Woo! woo! woo!" he said, growling at the four girls, "I'm a bear! Woo! woo!"

"Arthur," whispered Madge, "if you tell her we're here, I'm not going to the party with you; NOW!" "And if you tell on us," whispered Pete, "I'll tell on you the next time you hit me in school with a paper wad and you just SEE if I don't." Eliza now called, "Arthur, are they in there?"

"Woo! woo! woo!" growled Arthur, to hide his embarrassment. "Oh, come on, girls," he whispered; "how can I tell her you ain't here when you are?" "That's your affair," said Linda May with spirit. "You had no business finding us. And if you do tell on us, Madge won't go with you. You heard her say so. WILL you, Madge?" "No, I won't," said Madge. "Well, do you want me to tell a story?" growled Arthur. "Are they there, Arthur?" called Eliza. "No they ain't," answered Arthur, red and desperate. "Oh! Oh! Oh!" whispered Letitia, aghast. Eliza went on home. "Oh, Arthur!" said Pete with round eyes. "He told a story! He told a story!" chanted Linda May. "Well, I had to," said Arthur angrily. "You made me." "Oh! Oh!" moaned Letitia. "Oh, sister, shut up!" said Arthur fiercely. "I was just playing, anyway." "Girls, let's get out of here, and come over to my house," said Maage. Then she added, "I didn't think Arthur would have done it." "Well, didn't you tell me to?" "No I didn't. Ain't there always a hundred ways to get out of telling a story? You'd better have told on us than to have said what wasn't so. Come on, girls. Let us play by ourselves!"

Jesus Crucified and Buried.*

While hurried preparations were under way for the execution of the sentence against Jesus, the traitor Judas was enacting an awful tragedy. When he saw that his Master would neither defend nor deliver himself, but would permit himself to suffer the full penalty of the crimes falsely charged against him, there swept over his soul a sense of the horrible guilt he had incurred by his base act. Hastening to the hall where the chief priests and elders were gloating over the success of their plot he cried out in bitter remorse, "I have sinned, in that I have betrayed innocent blood!" The answer, coming from their sneering lips, cold and cruel as the sword drawn from its scabbard, seemed as if it would freeze his blood: "What is that to us? See ye to it!" In mad despair he dashed from his hand the silver which he had so eagerly clutched but a few hours before, but which now seemed to burn his very flesh, and hastened forth to swift and horrible death—the death of a hopeless suicide.

Besides the incident with which our last lesson closed, of the fainting of the Master beneath the weight of his cross, and its being placed upon the shoulders of Simon of Cyrene, but one thing occurred which the evangelists have seen fit to record during the journey to the place of death. The sufferings of Jesus seem to have touched the more sensitive hearts of the women of Jerusalem and they wept and wailed as he staggered along the way, bleeding from the cruel scourging and mocked by the heartless soldiers and rabble. Their sympathy was not unnoted by the Divine Physician, who ever forgot his own wounds in healing those of others. With infinite pathos he bade them spare their tears for the time, soon at hand, when they and their children should suffer the accumulated tribulations attending the siege of Jerusalem by the Roman army. The pages of Josephus bear witness to the true picture which he outlined in these words of tender and tearful prophecy.

A short distance outside the city walls, probably toward the northwest, there was a place known as Golgotha or Calvary, as we use the Hebrew or Latin name, meaning "a skull." Perhaps a rounded knoll, somewhat in shape like a human head, gave the place its title. Here three crosses were hastily erected, upon the central one of which Jesus was placed, the others being occupied by two thieves from the city prison. Thus, as Isaiah had foretold, "He was numbered with the transgressors." Victims were sometimes fastened to the cross with ropes, but in this instance the more common Roman method was used, and through the tender hands of the loving Christ were the cruel nails driven, while a huge spike was used to fasten his feet to the upright beam of wood. It will readily be imagined that the torture thus endured was most intense. Yet it was probably while this very torment was being inflicted that the Lord Jesus gave utterance to the first of his "seven words" on the cross, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do!" Never before was such a prayer uttered, so full of forgiving love, so ready to excuse gigantic wrong against oneself. Yet that love imparted itself to those who surrendered to the Crucified One, and they in turn were able to pray for their enemies.

It was now the third hour, or nine o'clock in the morning. A long day was before the soldiers in charge of the crucifixion, and they set about passing the time. First, however, they would divide the clothing of the dying men among them, which Roman law allowed them to do. All the other garments they distributed in equal portions, tearing the seams of the broad outer robes or cloaks. But the inner coat of Jesus was woven without seam, and to rend it would make it useless. So they cast lots to see who should possess it, thus unconsciously fulfilling another of the wonderful predictions of the 22nd Psalm concerning the Messiah. Meanwhile, the leaders among the Jews had observed with indignation that the soldiers, by order of Pilate, had placed over the head of Jesus an inscription that read, "This is Jesus, the King of the Jews." They ran back into the city and clamored for him to change this so as to show that Jesus falsely claimed this title, but Pilate was angry at his own defeat and refused to alter it.

Returning to the scene they determined to avenge themselves upon the Nazarene for the insult given them in his title. They began railing at him and challenging him to prove his right to the honors he had claimed: Thou that destroyest the temple and buildest it in three days, save thyself; if thou art the Son of God come down from the cross! He saved others but he cannot save himself! One of the thieves which were crucified with him joined in these railings, crying out to him: "Art thou not the Christ? Save thyself and us!" But the other, whose heart had been touched by the patient sufferings and forgiving spirit of Jesus, or who had, perhaps, known somewhat of the Master's ministry of grace, rebuked his companion, reminding him that they both deserved their punishment for the crimes they had committed, while the patient sufferer between them had done no wrong. Then, out of his penitent, trusting heart he sent his dying appeal to the Lord of love, "Jesus, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom." Full of gracious promise was the reply, "To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise."

Looking from his throne of agony upon the multitude that crowded around him Jesus now saw his broken-hearted mother standing near, her trembling form, shaken with sobs, tenderly supported by the beloved disciple. The sight touched him deeply. It likewise gave him sweetest comfort, for he now knew that she whom he loved best of all on earth would be cared for after he had gone. The tie that a mutual sorrow had already begun to create between them was perfected when he whom one of them had called her son, but both now knew to be their Savior, said to them in turn, "Behold thy Son! Behold thy mother!"

Three hours had Jesus hung upon the cross when, at the hour of noon, a strange darkness crept over the land and for three hours veiled the sunlight from the earth. Silence fell on the scene. Men's hearts failed them for fear. The scoffing crowd fell slowly back from the cross, and all waited with quaking spirits for some dread thing to happen. At last out of the midst of the darkness an awful cry of agony was heard. Those who were nearest caught the words, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" The bitter cup of death was being drained to its dregs. The Lord of life was tasting death for every man. He who knew no sin was being made sin for us. No other explanation can be given of that awful agony, that cry of terrible despair. But it was soon over. The unspeakable moment had passed, and now the physical weakness of Jesus was plainly bringing him close to the door of the unseen world. They heard him whisper faintly, "I thirst." A pitying hand dipped a sponge in the sour wine sitting in a vessel near by and putting it on a hyssop branch reached up and placed it to the lips of Jesus. It gave him strength for the few more words he wanted to utter. Summoning all his remaining strength he cried out so that all might hear, "It is finished!" Finished the ministry of suffering and shame. Finished the life of perfect surrender to the will of God and the needs of men. Patient, loving Savior, the day of thy toil is ended. It is time for rest. Gently, as though he would whisper into the ear of the loving God who held him to his breast, he uttered his last dying word, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit," and saying this he gave up his spirit unto God.

In terror the multitude looked one at another. The earth beneath them was quaking. The rocks were bursting asunder. As they fled back into the city they saw the tombs along the roadside gaping open as if the dwellers within had broken the bars of death. At the city gate they heard that the great veil which separated the most holy place of the temple from the court of the priests had suddenly been rent in twain from top to bottom, and the secret glories of the innermost sanctuary thrown open to the public gaze. They did not yet realize that Judaism was at an end and that the new covenant had been sealed in the blood of the strange victim of their malice. Three days later, after the resurrection of Jesus, it was rumored that many dead were seen alive about the city, visiting their former abodes. No wonder the centurion felt that one whose death could produce such marvelous effects was not only a righteous but a divine man. And the rending of the temple veil at the time of Jesus' death may have had its weight in producing faith in the hearts of the great company of priests who soon after Pentecost become obedient to the gospel.

But now that the world has heaped upon the living Christ all the scorn of which it is capable it heaps honor upon his poor body. Joseph of Arimathea, who believed in Jesus, but was afraid to confess him in life, comes boldly forward and claims the privilege of paying the last sad rites of burial. He had not consented to the murder of the Savior and but for his timidity was a noble and true man. He was also rich and influential as a member of the Sanhedrin. When Pilate had learned that Jesus was undoubtedly dead he gave permission to Joseph to take his body. Nicodemus, another secret believer in the Master, accompanied him, and they wrapped the precious body in fine linen and laid it in the new tomb of Joseph in a garden close by. "They bore him to his garden tomb as the light was striking low upon the leaves of trees and plants and upon the petals of the closing flowers." His Sabbath of rest was at hand. When its short hours were past he would usher in the new day of life and hope.

HOW DO YOU DO?

When you find yourself saying: "pretty well, thank you, but not very strong;" you are likely to be, as you say, "pretty well;" but getting no good of your food.

If you have money and leisure, take a vacation; the doctor calls it "a change." Which is good.

Almost as good is Scott's emulsion of cod-liver oil, instead of vacation. With it is better yet! the doctor is right.

We'll send you a little to try, if you like.

TOPIC FOR MARCH 24.

What I Owe to Christ.

(2 Cor. 8:9; 1 Peter 2:21-25.)

Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends. Jesus gave everything to us. We owe to him all that people can owe for whom a life has been sacrificed. He thought it not a thing to be prized, gripped, held, that he possessed, according to Paul, a high dominion; but he gave up all freely for our sakes. Therefore:

1. We owe to Christ the charities that fill our land. If the aged are cared for, if the orphan is protected, if the penniless sick are nursed, it is due to the presence of Christ in our land. As soon as the Hawaiians were converted they built their beautiful home for the aged. And everywhere that Christianity goes, love for the weak, in more or less perfect form, follows.

2. Women owe it to Jesus that they can sit by their husbands, their fathers, or their brothers in the churches and other public assemblies. Wherever Christ is not known woman is enslaved. It is he that struck the first blow at her chains. It is he that uttered her emancipation proclamation. Is it any wonder that she, far more faithfully than man, serves him?

3. We owe to Christ freedom of thought, freedom from hierarchies and ecclesiastical intolerances; for it is he that most effectually has taught the spirit of kindliness and forbearance. If there is any liberty in our beliefs, freedom from despotic intellectual shackles, we owe it to the measure of the mind of Christ that our age has caught.

4. We owe him spiritual conceptions of worship. The fact that we do not have shrines and holy places, that we are not compelled to go on pilgrimages, or to burden ourselves with toilsome ritual of sacrifices and incense, is due to Jesus, who taught that God must be worshiped in spirit and in truth.

5. Each one of us is conscious, finally, of some one thing that he especially owes to Jesus of Nazareth. For you it is one thing, for me another. It is for us to tell in this meeting, so far as we care to reveal it, the thing that has most helped our lives in our contact with the spirit of the Master. As for the great world of civilization in which we live, who can tell how much of its benefits we owe to the Carpenter of Nazareth? He doth bestride our narrow world like a colossus. There is just one great shadow that falls upon all mankind, all the time, and that is the shadow of Jesus Christ, the Galilean Teacher and the Savior of the world.

ON THE FARM.

There's many a successful business man who sits in his city office and lets his mind slip back to his boyhood days on the farm. How good it felt to live! What an appetite he had! How good everything tasted! How sound his sleep was! How eagerly he rose with the sun and raced with him through the long day. And now he's a successful man. But he can't sleep. He doesn't enjoy his food. His stomach is weak, his nerves are shaken, and he no more rises with the sun to race eagerly against him. His vitality is low and now and again his heart seems to plunge in his breast as if it would break loose. That's the price he has paid for success.

The mischief of the whole business is that he buys "tablets" of one sort or another to "aid" his digestion, and indulges in bromides and other nerve stimulants, just to hold himself together, and wonders why he seems to be getting worse.

The whole trouble with such a man generally lies in what is called a "weak" stomach. The food he eats does not nourish him because it is only partially digested and assimilated. No man can be stronger than his stomach, because it is in the stomach and allied organs of digestion and nutrition that strength is made from the food which is eaten.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cures diseases of the stomach and other organs of digestion and nutrition. It restores the strength of the body in the only way strength can be restored, by food which is perfectly digested and assimilated, when the diseased stomach (with its allied organs) is cured of disease. It is a blood-making, body-building medicine, inasmuch as blood is made from food and the body is built up by blood. It is not a stimulant, containing neither alcohol or any other narcotic.

NO OTHER DOCTOR FOR ME.

"Last spring, early, I wrote you my feelings and condition," says Mr. A. J. Vanderwater, 873 West Division Street, Chicago, Ill., "and you advised me to take Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery (a few bottles), and then write you how I felt. I am happy to say I am getting to feel fine. In all I have taken six bottles of the 'Discovery' and four or five vials of the little 'Pellets.' They have done me worlds of good. All my friends say: 'Vanderwater, how well you are looking. What in the world have you been doing?' I tell them I have been doctoring with Dr. R. V. Pierce, of Buffalo, N. Y. 'Why,' they say, 'you haven't been there?' No, I say, but I took his 'Golden Medical Discovery' and his little 'Pellets.' These medicines have wrought the great change in me. From a slow mope of a man that could hardly crawl, tired and sick all the time, and could do no work; to a man who can work, sleep, eat, and feel fine, and that tired feeling is all going away. I am very thankful that I wrote to Dr. Pierce. His 'Golden Medical Discovery' and his little liver 'Pellets' have almost made a new man of me. I feel young as I did at thirty years. No other doctor for me, only Dr. Pierce."

HAD GIVEN UP HOPE.

"I will express my thanks to you for the kindly advice you have given me in regard to my case," writes Miss Carrie J. Wharton, of Dunavant, Spottsylvania Co., Virginia. "When I wrote to you last spring I was in a terrible state of health. Had given up all hope of ever being better. I spit up my food all the time and it seemed sour as vinegar. I would have a bad sick headache every other week; in fact, my head never felt clear, and I was perfectly broken down under the strain of losing my food constantly. I had read a great deal in your books of what your medicine had done for others, so I wrote you and got your advice. Bought two bottles of 'Golden Medical Discovery' and the first dose I took I felt better. When I had finished taking the two bottles the spitting up had entirely stopped and my head was much better. I believe your medicines are just what you have said of them.

"I carefully read the books you sent me and shall always speak a good word for the 'Golden Medical Discovery' whenever I have a chance.

"You can publish this if you think it worth while. It might induce some one else to try your medicine who was suffering as I did. It was by the testimonials of others that I was induced to try it. I shall always rely upon your advice and feel safe to do as you tell me."

"We made the journey from Omaha to the Golden Gate on the Union Pacific to avoid the circuitous routes—an important item in the winter. Book Notes.

A handsome copy of the Bible is always an appropriate and appreciated present for a birthday. During the past four years the prices of Bibles have been very greatly reduced. Ten years ago a really good Bible cost from $8.00 to $10.00, but now as good or better editions can be purchased for less than half that amount. A postal card from you is all that is necessary to secure our General Catalogue, containing complete descriptive price-list.

The Genuineness and Authenticity of the Gospels, by B. A. Hinsdale, is, as the title implies, an argument, conducted on historical and critical grounds, in favor of the authenticity of the four gospels. Prof. Hinsdale, who recently died, was a most scholarly and able writer. This work deserves a place in the library of every minister of the gospel and every earnest student of the Bible. It is a cloth bound volume of 276 pages, price $1.25.

It seems necessary for us to again and again repeat the announcement that we can furnish any book published. Our business is not confined to the works which we ourselves publish. On receipt of the price, we will send, prepaid, any book in print. We have thus stated again and again, yet we are constantly receiving inquiries, our correspondents asking where they can obtain a certain book. If you want any book, just order it from us, and you will receive it promptly.

The second quarter of the year begins with April. It is time that Sunday-schools were sending us their orders for supplies for this quarter. Of course, the best plan is for schools to order for the entire year, but when this is impossible, care should be taken to get the order off in time each quarter. There should be no hesitation about where to send such orders. There are many series of supplies published, but there is one series that is endorsed by the great majority of our leading S. S. workers, which is used in two thirds of the schools of the Disciples of Christ, and which is conspicuously THE BEST — the series issued by the Christian Publishing Company. Why use inferior supplies when you may secure the best just as cheaply?

Alexander Campbell will grow and increase in popular esteem as the years go by. His greatness will be better appreciated by the Twentieth Century than it was by the Nineteenth. His works are more read to-day than ever before. Certainly no preacher of the Disciples should be without Campbell's complete works in his library. Our recent offer of the Campbell Library for $10.00, payable in installments, has placed these works within the reach of all.

Many orders are being received for What is Your Life? the new work by W. J. Russell. This book merits and will doubtless have a very large circulation. Some books have intrinsic value, but are so unskilfully written that their value is hidden. Other works are pleasing and entertaining, but of no real, lasting value. Mr. Russell's book is of immense practical value, and is also bright and entertaining—a rare combination. The price is but $1.00.

Mason City (Ia.) Notes.

The Mason City congregation of Disciples of Christ continues to prosper. Our building, already large, is all too small for our growing work. Extensive enlargement and improvement is planned which will be begun as soon as weather conditions permit. This will involve at least $5.000. The brethren here have a spirit of enterprise and prophetic vision which prepares for great things in the future.

The Memorial University projected by the Sons of Veterans, to be a great memorial of the soldiers, sailors and nurses of the Civil War, was located here last fall. This bids fair to be one of the greatest educational institutions on the continent. A university of the highest grade is to be established, besides a museum of war relics and documents second to none. As special features, the university will embrace a military department second only to West Point, a naval academy for the development of a naval reserve, which our close proximity to Clear Lake makes possible, a red cross department which will be more than a school for nurses, for it will include sanitation, hygiene and gastronomics. A Bible chair will be created and our own congregation has become in part responsible for its maintenance.

Three buildings, to cost a quarter of a million, will be erected this season, and at the laying of the corner stone of the first building which is provided by this city, President McKinley has promised to officiate. It is probable that this occasion will bring together the greatest company of distinguished statesmen ever assembled west of the Mississippi.

Many prominent and wealthy people have become interested and a number have signified their purpose either to build a hall or endow a chair. The G. A. R. and W. R. C. organizations have, of course, a lively interest and are arranging to do something handsome when the Board of Regents are ready to designate what would be desirable.

Col. A. L. Sorter, Jr., who is a member of the Christian Church and one of Mason City's most honored citizens, is the originator of the idea and has worked tirelessly for its realization and that it should be located in his own city in the middle west. He is the president of the Board of Regents and, fertile of resource, will direct the enterprise to conspicuous success.

We are called upon to record the death of a daughter of one of Iowa's pioneers, Daniel Bates, founder of the Evangelist at Mt. Pleasant, which, under various names, and after many combinations with other papers, has evolved into the present CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Her name was Aurelia Lunbeck, wife of John Lunbeck, who still survives her at the age of 86. They were married at Mt. Pleasant in 1846. Removing to Leon in 1855, they became charter members of that church. Born in the Old Dominion state in 1824, her life covered the last three-quarters of the century and she fell asleep after a brief illness March 2. "Her works do follow her."

Stranger Than Fiction

A Remedy Which Has Revolutionized the Treatment of Stomach Troubles.

The remedy is not heralded as a wonderful discovery nor yet a secret patent medicine, neither is it claimed to cure anything except dyspepsia, indigestion and stomach troubles with which nine out of ten suffer.

The remedy is in the form of pleasant tasting tablets or lozenges, containing vegetable and fruit essences, pure aseptic pepsin (government test), golden seal and diastase. The tablets are sold by druggists under the name of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. Many interesting experiments to test the digestive power of Stuart's Tablets show that one grain of the active principle contained in them is sufficient to thoroughly digest 3,000 grains of raw meat, eggs and other wholesome food.

Stuart's Tablets do not act upon the bowels like after dinner pills and cheap cathartics, which simply irritate and inflame the intestines without having any effect whatever in digesting food or curing indigestion.

If the stomach can be rested and assisted in the work of digestion it will very soon recover its normal vigor, as no organ is so much abused and overworked as the stomach.

This is the secret, if there is any secret, of the remarkable success of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, a remedy practically unknown a few years ago and now the most widely known of any treatment for stomach weakness.

This success has been secured entirely upon its merits as a digestive pure and simple because there can be no stomach trouble if the food is promptly digested.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets act entirely on the food eaten, digesting it completely, so that it can be assimilated into blood, nerve and tissue. They cure dyspepsia, water brash, sour stomach, gas and bloating after meals, because they furnish the digestive power which weak stomachs lack and unless that lack is supplied it is useless to attempt to cure by the use of "tonics," "pills" and cathartics which have absolutely no digestive power.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets can be found at all drugstores and the regular use of one or two of them after meals will demonstrate their merit better than any other argument.

Arkansas Notes.

A pleasant dedication service was held at Oak Hill, Franklin county, Ark., on the 24th of February. The house is a neat frame structure, entirely out of debt. This has been largely the work of Bro. West and family. There are a number of faithful members in the neighborhood. Bro. Ferrill, of Coal Hill, has also done much to advance the cause. He has preached for them from the beginning. The writer remained and preached for a week, resulting in ten accessions to the membership, one baptized.

The little band at Helena are working faithfully and heroically. The corresponding secretary has visited them several times this winter, one immersed last visit. They meet in the studio of Bro. Funkhouser, photographer.

Bro. Jones, of Caddo Gap district, reports for about four months, 150 days work, 60 sermons, 40 baptisms, 20 added from other churches, $60 raised for self-support, $200 for building and repairs, one congregation organized, two Sunday-schools, two houses building. Note that he averaged one addition for every sermon, one addition for each dollar raised for self-support, received $25 from mission board, and added 2.4 to the membership for every dollar contributed from mission fund, while he raised for religious purposes $10.40 for every dollar of missionary money. Will not this investment pay?

I am assisting Bro. Barnes at Gravette in a short meeting.

Bolling V. Walker, highly recommended from Texas, will take the work at Arkadelphia. The church at Pine Bluff is about to employ a preacher, Bro. Frank Thompson, of Illinois.

Bro. Clark, the efficient and industrious evangelist of the southwest district, has gone to his reward. The work will be continued by Bro. Ratliffe. E. C. BROWNING.

MUSIC AND REST.

"There is no music in a rest, but there is the making of music in it." In our whole life melody, the music is broken off here and there by "rests," and we foolishly think we have come to the end of time. God sends a time of forced leisure—sickness, disappointed plans, frustrated efforts—and makes a sudden pause in the choral hymn of our lives, and we lament that our voices must be silent, and our part missing in the music which ever goes up to the ear of the Creator. How does the musician read the rest? See him beat time with unvarying count and catch up the next note true and steady, as if no breaking place had come in between.

Not without design does God write the music of our lives. Be it ours to learn the time, and not be dismayed at the "rests." They are not to be slurred over, nor to be omitted, nor to destroy the melody, nor to change the keynote. If we look up, God himself will beat the time for us. With the eye on him we shall strike the next note full and clear.

For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

Current Events.

That Oath of Installation. English Catholics have lately made a great row over the fact that in the King's installation oath the old clause was retained, which has been there since the coronation of William and Mary, declaring the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation superstitious and the mass idolatrous. This is inconsistent with their ideas of religious liberty. It has never been maintained that all religions are on a par in Great Britain. By the legal establishment of the Episcopal Church, all forms of dissent, both Protestant and Catholic, are officially condemned even though they enjoy practical toleration. But why should the Romanists be so shocked at hearing a civil ruler condemn certain religious doctrines and practices? At this very time Catholic papers are particularly full of arguments for the restoration of the temporal power of the Pope. They wish to make him again a civil ruler, to put him on a par with Edward VII as an independent monarch. Is it expected that when he comes into this position he will retract all the uncomplimentary utterances which he has made about Protestantism and will henceforth maintain a strictly impartial attitude toward all religions? Will all religions be equal before the law in Rome when the Pope comes again into the "Patrimony of Peter" (which, strangely enough, does not mean a fishing-net but a kingdom)? Verily, no. The very reason why he wishes sovereignty is that he may advance the interests of the Church, i. e., his Church. The trouble is, then, not that our Catholic friends really object on principle to utterances by civil rulers against any form of religion, but that they object to utterances against their form of religion, while at the same time they wish their leader to be given kingly power and left free to say and do what he pleases against other forms of religion. It is not a plea for justice but for special privilege.

Russian Obstruction. The complication in China —like an iceberg—shows but a fraction of its outline above the surface, while the rest is submerged and obscured in a sea of diplomatic complexities. The attitude of Russia at present forms the most threatening element of the situation. In spite of official assurances from St. Petersburg that permanent occupancy of Manchuria is not intended, and in spite of spasmodic Chinese protests against Russian demands, it is becoming increasingly evident that Russia is, in effect, trying to enjoy the general benefits of co-operating with the powers and at the same time secure the specific advantages which may accrue from making a private deal with China. The Russian representative at Pekin has suddenly come forward as the opponent of the policy of demanding further punishments of guilty Chinese officials. It is scarcely credible that the motive is purely humanitarian. More probably Russia gives her influence on this point as a quid pro quo for concessions in Manchuria. A flurry, which looked like war, was occasioned by a misunderstanding between the Russian and British authorities at Tien Tsin, in regard to a railway siding which was claimed by both. Troops were drawn up on both sides and entrenched, but more reasonable counsels have prevailed and the affair has been referred to the home governments for settlement. A more abiding, though less immediate, occasion for alarm is the hostility of Japan toward Russia. The former's long-standing jealousy of the latter's encroachment in Corea is stirred up by a report of the landing of Russian military supplies at Masaupho, which, it is feared, may presage a violation of the agreement to preserve Corean independence. In addition to this, Japan may demand some concessions as an offset to Russia's new powers in Manchuria. In short, Russia's attempt to make a separate and semi-secret agreement with China has made more trouble, and has hindered negotiations to a greater degree, than anything which has occurred since the cessation of hostilities. The ministers are now debating the question of indemnities.

Socialism in Hawaii. There must be something in the atmosphere of the Pacific which tends to radicalism in government. Already Australia and New Zealand have furnished some advanced suggestions, some of which, such as the Australian ballot system, have found world-wide favor. The newly elected legislature in the Hawaiian Islands, composed chiefly of men who opposed annexation to the United States, is projecting some experimental reforms of a very radical nature. The legislators themselves are said to be, for the most part, unlettered and untraveled men, some of whom cannot even speak English, though the organic law of the territory requires that the proceedings of the legislature shall be in that language. Apparently they are very thoroughly under the control of a few leaders and these leaders happen to have a strong socialistic bent. The most sweeping of the proposed reforms is the single tax and there is said to be actually some possibility that a measure carrying this system into effect will be passed by the legislature, though it would doubtless be vetoed by Gov. Dole. The measure is naturally opposed most strongly by the sugar interest, for Hawaii, industrially speaking, is one great sugar plantation and practically the entire burden of taxation would fall upon the sugar planters. There is still greater probability of the adoption of a liquor dispensary system similar to that of South Carolina but with some added restrictions. Not only shall the government dispensary sell liquor only in sealed packages which are not to be opened on the premises, but a local option clause is added by which each community shall decide whether or not it shall have a dispensary. The liquor interests are fighting this proposition as bitterly as the sugar interests fight the single tax. Other proposed measures are for the establishment of a quarantine against consumptives, proportional representation and municipal charters of the pattern embodying advance reforms. With all of these measures on the calendar, the doings of the Hawaiian legislature will be well worth watching during the next few months.

Ex-President Harrison Dead. On March 13, Benjamin Harrison died at his home in Indianapolis at the age of sixty-seven years. Though the grandson of a president of the United States, no man was ever less overshadowed by his ancestry. He served the country in many capacities and in all of them with the highest order of ability and with absolute fidelity. As a general in the Union army in the Civil war, as United States senator, as President of the United States, and not less in the dignified and difficult, though unofficial, position of ex-President, he won admiration even from those who disagreed with him. He was an earnest advocate of civil service reform, urged the annexation of Hawaii and emphasized the importance of enlarging and modernizing our navy. Since his retirement from office he has engaged in the practice of law and has been employed in some of the most important cases in recent years. His last conspicuous case was the Venezuela boundary case. His disapproval of the foreign policy of the present administration became outspoken after the November elections and he has spoken and written freely upon the subject, especially in the North American Review. It has been said, not without a certain truth, that he was the American Gladstone of this generation.

Mr. Carnegie's Latest Gifts. A few weeks ago a prominent weekly published a symposium by many rich men on "Why Millionaires Cannot Stop Making Money." And now the millionaire whom J. Pierpont Morgan—certainly an excellent authority—calls the richest man in the world, has stopped. Since the consolidation of the steel interests, Mr. Carnegie has announced his retirement from the business of getting money and will henceforth devote his energies to spending and giving. At the same time came the official announcement of two immense gifts. To the city of St. Louis, Mr. Carnegie offers a million dollars for the building of a public library and several branch libraries, on condition that the city provide $150,000 a year for maintenance. The annual library fund at present is only about $100,000, raised by a tax of one-fifth of a mill on the dollar. A movement is already on foot to submit, at the coming election on April 2, a proposition to raise this to two-fifths of a mill. This generous offer on the part of Mr. Carnegie is exactly in line with one of the most important needs of this city and it is to be hoped that the conditions will be speedily complied with. The idea of using at least half the sum in the erection of branch libraries in all parts of the city does not minister to the false pride in having the most sumptuous building possible, but it is the way to make the library of most actual benefit to the people who need it. Mr. Carnegie's theory is that there should be one branch library to each 60,000 of population. In accordance with this view he has made a much larger gift to New York City, providing for the erection of sixty-five branch libraries at a cost of $80,000 each, a total of $5,200,000. At the same time he established a fund of $5,000,000 to pension superannuated and disabled employes of the company which he has just left.

The National Game in Cuba. It is reported that a new baseball park has been opened in Havana, Cuba, and that the game will henceforth take the place of the Spanish national sport of bull-fighting. The "pavilion," which in American parlance means the grand stand, is said to be larger than any for that purpose in the United States. This settles it. Why insist on the Platt resolution, with its vexatious provisions for American interference in Cuban affairs in any one of several emergencies? What surrender on the part of Cuba could be more thoroughgoing and reassuring than this substitution of our great national game for the savage amusement of her former masters? This benevolent assimilation of American baseball can be interpreted only as an indication of the willingness of our wards in the Antilles to accept the blessings of American civilization without remonstrance wherever they can do it without compromising their dignity or appearing to give in. Anyhow, why should we worry about the attitude of the Constitutional Convention toward our government, when the members of that very convention are seeking relaxation from their arduous duties by repairing to the aforesaid capacious pavilion and howling like American-born fanatics when, in the last half of the ninth inning, with two out and three men on bases, the right-fielder of the Havana team catches a long fly and thereby administers a shut-out to the visiting team from Cienfuegos. When the common passion of the baseball fanatic throbs in the heart of the Cuban and the American, the unification of our political and commercial interests can be only a matter of time.

Death of the Telephone Monopoly. A decision has been given in the United States Supreme Court which virtually puts an end to the claim of the Bell Telephone Company to a monopoly. The case affected directly the validity of the Berliner patent on the transmitter now used in the Bell telephones. The Berliner patent was applied for nearly thirty years ago, but before it was granted a transfer was made to the Bell company, which had but recently secured the patent on a slightly different instrument. The Berliner patent was then dropped until 1891 when, the Bell patent being about to expire, it was taken up again and formally granted, thus giving virtually a double lease of life to the patent on practically the same invention. The Bell Company bases its claim to a monopoly on the Berliner patent, the validity of which is now denied by the court upon four strong grounds. It is not considered probable that the decision will be reversed, and independent companies will hereafter have the right of way. At the beginning of the present year the Bell companies in the United States had a total of 633,000 subscribers, while the many independent companies aggregated 1,500,000. The latter, however, had the far less profitable part of the business, since they flourished chiefly in the smaller towns, while the Bell companies, being first on the ground, were already intrenched in all the larger cities. It is not quite safe to predict that the day of extortionate telephone charges is over, because, in the nature of the case, the big company which is already established in a city has an advantage in competing with a new company. But the independent companies now have at least an even chance in the new fields.

The Missouri Legislature. The Missouri Legislature closed its session on Monday, March 18, at the hour which was called noon, but which was really well along toward evening—a result accomplished by the usual puerile method of turning back the hands of the clock to make more time when adjournment has been fixed for a certain hour. The session has done its work reasonably well—better, on the whole, than Missouri legislatures usually do. In modifying the unfair Nesbit election law it both confessed the unfairness of that law and showed itself amenable in a degree to public opinion. The modified law is generally approved by Democrats and is accepted as satisfactory by some Republicans. In any event, however, it does not fully take effect until after the spring election in St. Louis. Gov. Dockery mentions the following pieces of legislation as the most important work done by this legislature "The law providing for the taxation of franchises; the law permitting the infliction of the death penalty for kidnaping; the law prohibiting members of boards of managers from being directly or indirectly interested in contracts let for work or supplies for state institutions; the congressional, legislative and judicial apportionment bills; the law providing for the taxation of whisky; the bill providing for the settlement of controversies growing out of the beer inspection law; various bills amending the road laws; the game law; the Hall medical bill; the World's Fair bill; the bill authorizing a revision of the chapter of our laws relating to the assessment and collection of the revenue, and the constitutional amendment submitting to the voters the question of continuing the present investment of the school moneys." The legislature pleased its friends and surprised its critics by resisting the lobby which fought the franchise tax.

A Literary Center. Our supercilious contemporaries on the Atlantic slope who cherish the opinion that the people of the United States draw their literary supplies chiefly from that section of the country, may be surprised to note some facts which have recently been published by the Post Office Department in regard to the circulation of second-class mail matter, which includes all periodicals sent at the one cent per pound rate. Greater New York, of course, with by far the greatest population, sends the largest amount of this sort of matter. Chicago is next and St. Louis is third on the list. Philadelphia and Boston come farther down the list. Each of the latter cities has a greater number of periodicals than St. Louis, but the total quantity mailed is less. There are thirteen cities in this country in each of which more than one hundred periodicals are registered as second-class matter. Not only is the total quantity of such matter which is sent from the St. Louis post office greater in proportion to the population than that of any other of these cities, but it is greater in proportion to the number of periodicals. In other words the newspapers and magazines published in St. Louis do more business on an average than those of any other city in the Union. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is proud to have a share in keeping up this average. Prospective publishers who are considering the establishment of periodicals will do well to bear in mind these facts about St. Louis.

Brevities. A foolish quarrel between Count Boni Castellane and M. Rodays, Editor of the Paris Figaro, led to a duel in which the latter was wounded.

Gov. Wells, of Utah, has shown both courage and sense in vetoing the polygamy bill passed by the legislature of that state.

A Washington, D. C., judge has ruled that a prayer-meeting is not a "disorderly assembly." The crusaders who were arrested for holding a prayer-meeting in a pool-room have accordingly been discharged.

The British navy, after its officers have pooh-poohed the idea of submarine boats and have made merry over the gullibility of America and France in trying to use them, has ordered five Holland submarine boats "for experimental purposes."

The contract for the converting of the London underground railway to an electric system has been allotted to three firms, one in Hungary, one in Austria and one in Germany. The American system, though possessing some recognized advantages, was more expensive.

There is more than a possiblity of another anthracite coal strike beginning April 1, when the agreement terminates upon which the settlement of the former strike was based. The miners of bituminous coal make an annual agreement with their operators on this date and the anthracite men want to join forces with them.

The Cuban committee on foreign affairs is said to be solidly opposed to accepting the terms of the Platt resolution. Some form of compromise will probably be proposed. It is believed that the Cubans will readily concede what was demanded in regard to the Isle of Pines, but will not admit the right of intervention.

Hypnotic Conversion.

A recent number of the Christian Commonwealth, London, contains a sermon by Prof. M'Kendrick on the influence of the body upon the religious life. The sermon is in many respects a remarkable deliverance. It strikes at some well known evils in a style which must make a profound impression. Among these evils the Professor reckons Hypnotic Conversion. The same subject was treated in the Christian Quarterly for April, 1898. Both of these deliverances are well supplemented, in a very fascinating book which has recently appeared by Dr. Starbuck, a professor in Leland Stanford, Jr., University, in which the professor talks about the "Psychology of Religion," and regards the whole question of conversion from a scientific point of view.

It is gratifying to notice the general agreement of these different writers, though undoubtedly they have not been in touch with one another. The fact shows a certain trend, and this trend is symptomatic of a return to common sense, as well as the teachings of the Bible, with respect to one of the most important questions connected with the plan of salvation.

Prof. M'Kendrick reaches the conclusion that much of what is called conversion, in popular revivals, is nothing more than a certain species of hypnotism, which intensely emotional revivalists are able to produce on susceptible persons. No doubt the contention can be sustained by an appeal to the facts of the case. It would be strange indeed if the human element did not sometimes predominate in the manner suggested. At the same time we must be careful not to press this idea too far. There was considerable excitement on the day of Pentecost, and the same was true in the case of all other conversions recorded in the book of Acts. It would be almost impossible for men to act with perfect calmness when they are under the influence of a deep conviction that they are sinners, and that Jesus is their only Savior. In all such cases there must be some excitement, and certainly the whole emotional nature ought to be deeply stirred. Still, it remains true that in very many cases converts are made simply by hypnotic influence, or by what the new psychology is pleased to denominate "suggestion." In some instances the manipulator of these revival meetings must be held severely responsible for the manner in which he carries on his work. The whole thing, from beginning to end, is an exhibition of the art of the hypnotist. Nor is it necessary to accuse him of playing a part. It is just as possible for him to be deceived, as to the power he is exerting, as it is for his converts to be deceived. He may be intensely in earnest. Indeed, if he is not in earnest it is probable he will not be a success in producing hypnotic conversion.

It is for this very reason that the power exercised is so dangerous. Of course, it may occasionally rest in the hands of some unscrupulous preacher who uses it in a purely professional way. In such a case the evil becomes very dangerous, and such men should be watched very carefully, when it is evident that they are disposed to use this power for their own selfish ends.

However, we must believe that very few popular evangelists can be charged with such a perversion of their high office. We are glad to believe that even where the conversions are purely hypnotic, the evangelist himself is not conscious that the power he is using is human rather than divine.

This brings us to say that after all the cross is itself a sufficient magnet with which to draw men to Christ. Jesus said of himself: "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." The magnetism of the cross is therefore the influence and the only influence which ought to be used, at least from the human side of the question, in order to the conversion of sinners. Paul would not glory in anything else. It was this that was a stumbling-block to the Jew and foolishness to the Greek; but to those who were saved, both Jew and Greek, it was the power of God and wisdom of God. This old, old story is still the magnet which the preacher must hold before the eyes of the people. Doubtless human methods may be wisely devised by which this old story may be brought, most effectively, to bear upon the unconverted, but no method should be used which is likely to take the gaze of the soul away from the cross. While the eyes are fixed upon "Christ and Him crucified," there need be no fear about hypnotic conversion as a purely human result. What is to be feared is the tendency of some preachers to depend chiefly upon stories and incidents of a pathetic character, which appeal to the emotions without calling the attention of the sinner to his own lost state and the only means by which he can be saved. Indeed, a considerable amount of revival preaching has very little Christ in it, and as for the cross of Christ, this is scarcely ever mentioned. Such preachers get their work started, and then by laying certain social and emotional trains, they are able to produce, almost at will, marvelous results, by operating through these hypnotic channels.

We may not be prepared to accept all that Prof. Starbuck says in his "Psychology of Religion," but he is evidently working on the side of the conversion question which needs very careful consideration. It seems to us that he reaches practically the biblical point of view, though he uses scientific language, and conducts his investigations according to scientific methods. Here is one thing he says: "Conversion is primarily an unselfing. The first birth of the individual is into his own little world, . . . In conversion the person emerges from a smaller, limited world of existence into a larger world of being. His life becomes swallowed up in a larger whole."

We remember listening once to a discussion on "The Psychology of Conversion" by a group of ministers of several denominations, and the discussion developed the fact that they knew nothing about psychology and little about conversion. We need some clearer thinking about this fundamental fact of religious experience. One cannot substitute psychology for conversion, any more than the science of optics can be substituted for the art of painting, but a study of conversion from the scientific standpoint—i. e., from the standpoint of what we can know about the human mind by watching it work—may help us to a better understanding of that greatest of all changes which can take place in the mind of man, the change which we call conversion.

Notes and Comments.

A paper representing a denomination which is not conspicuous for evangelism has at last waked up on the subject and suggests that in the Lenten meetings there ought really to be an effort to secure accessions. "We do not want to over-persuade, but why should we not persuade people to come into the church if we believe the church to be a good thing?" For substance of doctrine, this is extremely true. But the fear of over-persuasion, in spite of the fact that the church is "a good thing," reminds us a trifle of the ingratiating old preacher who was so considerate of the feelings of his titled parishioners:

"He knew their honors sure would ne'er be driven.
But humbly hoped they'd please to go to heaven."

A recent number of the Standard (Baptist) contains an article by Dr. E. B. Hulbert, Dean of the Divinity School of the University of Chicago, advocating the establishment of a Baptist missionary magazine to take the place of the many little publications issued by the different societies in the interest of different sections of the missionary work of that denomination. This is a suggestion which is perhaps equally pertinent to our own situation. We need a magazine which will give all the news of all our missionary enterprises and will also tell what others are doing in the various fields. The publication of such a magazine would not necessarily involve the unification of the societies; it would relieve the columns of our weekly papers from the pressure to which they are subjected in the periods of preparation for our missionary offerings, and would secure on the part of the brotherhood a more general and adequate acquaintance with our whole missionary work.

The twentieth century gospel campaign is now on in many cities. Many who are not accustomed to doing "personal work" are beginning to feel their responsibility in the matter and to ask how they can go about it to influence another personally and directly for good. It is not always an easy thing to approach a person and inquire about his spiritual welfare. The question may well be asked, Under what circumstances is one justified in so doing? It is easier asked than answered. But two things are true: First, zeal is no substitute for tactful adaptation of the method to the person and the end. An awkward, tactless approach cannot persuade a man to take life insurance or buy a lightning rod or vote for a certain candidate, and the agent who fails in any of these lines cannot excuse himself on the ground that his anxiety to persuade led him to choose an abrupt and ineffective method. It takes more tact to win a soul by personal work than it does to sell life insurance. Second, it should be remembered that, tact or no tact, there is no error so bad as that of lacking interest enough to try. The man who never fails because he never tries is a more complete failure than he who tries and fails.

Recent promotions in the army and navy have suggested many criticisms on the system which promotes one man for meritorious services, over the heads of a hundred men whose services might have been just as meritorious if they had had a chance. Yes, it does seem hard that men who waited faithfully under orders, ready for any deed of heroism, should go unrewarded, while the man to whom the opportunity came gets all the glory and the reward. But if the system is bad, it did not originate in our Departments of War and Navy. It seems to be the law of life that the man who does something gets the reward, and the man who might, could, would or should have done it if circumstances had been different, has to be satisfied with the consciousness of his own merit. Many a potential military genius has lived and died in time of peace without renown. Many a boy with the possibilities of an admiral within him has lived his life out on the farm and never seen the sea. It is customary to encourage the young by saying that men make their own opportunities, but the saying is only partially true; and it remains true that in the great battle of human life, just as in the battles of Manila and Santiago, the distribution of opportunity is as unequal as the distribution of talents. The spread of education multiplies opportunities, but it can never equalize them and the man who does is still he who gets the reward, in the army or out of it.

The chaplain of the Nebraska House of Representatives is evidently a man who goes to the point with admirable directness and with specific statements of detail in his official prayers. It is reported that, in the course of an invocation, probably just after a recess, he said: "O Lord, we thank Thee that the members of the legislature can come and go between their homes and their legislative halls with such ease and such little expense to themselves." We dissent from this view of the relations between the railroads and the Representatives. On the whole, we are inclined to agree with Gov. Pingree that legislative free passes, making possible this coming and going "with little expense to themselves," are a demoralizing influence which does not call for the gratitude of the public, however thankful it may make the members of the legislature.

One of the inevitable arguments against closing the St. Louis World's Fair on Sundays is that the people must go somewhere on Sunday and it is better that they should go to the Fair than to the saloons, which are also open on that day. Setting aside the fact that the saloons have no right to be open on Sunday and will not be when we get a decent city administration, the argument is not wholly relevant. An open Fair would probably take more people from the churches than from the saloons. In any case it would impose the seven-day week on the employees of the Fair. If the advocates of Sunday opening have suddenly become so solicitous about keeping people out of the saloon on Sunday, let them not try to do it by piling an extra day of work on the Fair employees, but let them organize a vigilance committee to secure the enforcement of the law and see that the saloons are emptied and locked on Sunday, Fair or no Fair.

The Path of the Just.

TEXT.—The path of the just is as a shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day. —Prov. 4:18.

Have you ever been met by diverging paths as you traveled, and stood in doubt which to take? Such experiences are common; but there should be no doubt, no hesitation, when it comes to a choice between the path of the just and the path of the unjust. The two paths are contrasted in this chapter of Proverbs, and our text sets forth the greater attractiveness of the path of the just or righteous.

A Way of Uprightness.

There can be no mistaking the way, for as Isaiah says, "The way of the just is uprightness." It is the way of divine judgments, the way of purity and peace. To walk in it is to avoid dissimulation and insincerity; to be earnest, straightforward, genuine; to be manly, courageous, faithful. Crookedness is opposed to uprightness. Unfortunately, we may see illustrations of this evil quality in those who move around us. A path or a way is not to lie upon, like a bed, but to pass over; hence we are to understand by this figure a righteous and honorable life—the whole procession of human actions.

Increasing Light.

There may be moments of doubt, because of the darkness of our own minds, but if we persevere in the path of the just, we are greeted and gladdened with steadily increasing light. That is, doing right has as part of its reward the knowledge of still higher righteousness, and the ability to do it. The text which suggests our subject has in it a picture of the dawn. Who has not reveled in its glories? First, there is only a faint flush along the eastern horizon. Then it spreads through the surrounding clouds, rising toward the zenith, higher and wider, clearer and more splendid, till the entire east has blossomed, and forth from his many-pillared chambers drives the chariot of the king of day. Faint and dim at first, perhaps; cold and gray and chill, the way of the righteous, but it brightens with increasing light and warmth, unto the perfect day.

A Safe Guide.

In this highway we do not walk alone. There are few people who like to travel without company, and the pathway of the just has at least the promise of an infallible Guide. "Thou that art upright dost direct the path of the just." The tired pilgrims are not left to their own devices. One is with them higher and mightier than they, and He can be trusted to guide them safely—

"O'er moor and fen,
O'er crag and torrent till the night is gone,
And with the morn those angel faces smile,
That we have loved long since and lost awhile."

Therefore let us look up and say, "To Thy name and to Thy memorial is the desire of our soul."

Inspiring Examples.

Luke tells us of Zacharias and Elizabeth, that "they were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless." We may take this godly couple as representative of a great company who have followed the same radiant way of faith and obedience. Read again the story of early Christianity, or go back again to the ancient people of God, and see what a noble company have journeyed along this pathway. It is a way that has been made glorious by the footsteps of their feet. And in our own day and time, it is the chosen way of multitudes of the choicest spirits in all lands. We must never forget that obedience to the commands of the Lord is required of all who enter this way, and day by day strive to be found like these ancient worthies, "blameless."

A Fragrant Memory.

"The memory of the just is blessed, but the name of the wicked shall rot," Prov. 10:7. After all, a matter of chief concern is the end of the pathway; to what destination does it bring us? This is the crucial test. Even if it were a pleasant way, and every step were amidst flowers, and among congenial companions, and the air resounded with laughter and song, we could not afford to traverse it, if its end were darkness and death. But its end is the unshadowed land, for "there shall be no night there," and those who pass over it join the "choir invisible," to live again in "lives made better by their presence," and in loving hearts that cherish their names.

Prayer.

We thank Thee, O God, for light in the midst of darkness. Thou hast cast up a safe way, over which no unclean thing can pass; no lion is there, nor any ravenous beast, but the redeemed walk there. Guide our tired feet into that pathway, O God, and give us wisdom and grace to persevere therein, until the day dawn, and the shadows flee away. Amen.

Editor's Easy Chair.

The scene has shifted. On an upper portico in southern Florida, with the blue waters of Biscayne Bay spread out before us, and beyond the Bay Biscayne, Key Biscayne, eight miles out, at the southern extremity of which is a lighthouse, and beyond the key the Atlantic's proud waves, lifting their white caps. The bay is enlivened by a large number of sailing vessels, whose white sails are glistening in the light of the afternoon's sun. Such is the scene from Capt. Haden's residence, one mile south of Cocoanut Grove, and six miles south of Miami, the southern terminus of the Florida East Coast Railway. Capt. Haden, grandson of Joel Haden, one of Missouri's widely-known pioneer Christian preachers, is a retired army officer who has located in this salubrious clime for the benefit of his health. Ten years ago he married Miss Florence Powers, daughter of Dr. Powers, of Franklin county, Mo., whose family we have known for nearly a quarter of a century. About five years ago Capt. Haden was retired from active service on account of impaired health, after more than twenty years in the United States army. Soon thereafter he located in this tropical region of Florida, where he and his wife are building them a lovely home and surrounding themselves with tropical fruits and flowers, and living an idyllic life. At their kind invitation we are their guests for several days.

En route to this haven of rest, we made brief stops at St. Augustine, Palm Beach and Miami. The first of these, named after the Bishop of Hippo, Augustine, because Pedro Menendez discovered the harbor on the birthday of that saint, is too much visited and written about to need any description. Its history from the day the Spanish fleet landed there, Aug. 28, 1565, until the present, has been a most changeful and eventful one, and for many years at the beginning, it was an exceedingly cruel and bloody history. Old Fort Marion, as the ancient fort is now called, the great hotels, the ancient Catholic cathedral, the old slave market on the plaza, the narrow Spanish streets, the drive out across the island to South beach—these are some of the chief attractions at this oldest city in the New World. Having glimpsed all these, and communicated with home direct by telegraph, we departed for Palm Beach—a celebrated winter resort. The great hotels of the Floria East Coast Railway Company—the "Poinciana" and "The Breakers," the former on Lake Worth and the latter on the ocean beach, are marvels of modern hostelry, while the palm groves and other tropical growths make a paradise for the lover of the beautiful. We availed ourselves of the wheel chairs, driven by bicycles, to see the attractions of this popular place, as we tarried there only one day. Miami, the terminus of the East Coast Railway, is rapidly improving, and as the East Coast seaport for the Occidental and Peninsular line of steamers is destined to become an important place. It is located on the Miami river and near the northern end of Biscayne Bay. "The Royal Palm" there is another one of those remarkable hotels which distinguish the East Coast of Florida. These have all been crowded the present season.

Leaving the railroad, which can carry us no further south, we employ a hack which conveys us over a road smooth as asphalt, which leads most of the way through a dense jungle of tropical undergrowth, to Cocoanut Grove, and thence on a mile or more southward along the shore to the residence of Capt. Haden. This is the most tropical region we have visited. It is summer here sure enough. The corn is tasseling, tropical fruits are abundant, and seabathing is good. We had a ride into the country to-day and saw the possibilities of this region, in trees laden with grape fruit, oranges, limes, guavas, lemons and tropical papaws. Mangoes, pineapples, sappadilloes and bananas also abound. Imagine us trying to do justice to all these, nearly all of which are now in season. The land here is cheap yet, but Capt. Haden estimates that it takes from $100 to $200 per acre to put it in proper cultivation. Except the swales and savannas, the ground is covered with pine trees and coral limestone, which requires time and labor to remove. But once the soil is prepared, the climate does the rest with a little intelligent oversight in the care of the trees that are planted. The freezes which have so injuriously affected other parts of the state in past years have had little or no effect here. We are enjoying every hour of our stay here, walking or riding through the forest, rowing or sailing upon the beautiful bay, or sitting upon the eastern veranda and watching the ever changing colors of the water, and seeing the white sails far out on the bay with an occasional steamer northward or southward bound.

But in a few days, and before our readers see this, we will have turned our backs upon these scenes, as we begin our homeward journey. Our plan is to make very brief pauses at Jacksonville, Fla., Savannah, Ga., Columbia, S. C., Asheville, N. C., and Lexington, Ky., where we hope to take in the Congress, and then to St. Louis, thus ending a restful vacation.

Questions and Answers.

Please reconcile the statements in 2 Kings 2:11 and John 3:13. E. W. K.

The reference is to the apparent contradiction between the statement that "Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven" and the words of Jesus to Nicodemus that "No man hath ascended into heaven but he that descended out of heaven, even the Son of Man which is in heaven." The reconciliation is to be found by considering the words of Jesus in connection with their context. Jesus was claiming the right to testify of heavenly things. He does so by asserting that he is a heavenly person, one whose home is in heaven, and that there is no other person among men who was similarly qualified to speak of heavenly things because no man had gone up to bring down the heavenly secrets. The fact of Elijah's translation does not come into conflict with this statement.

Would a minister of the gospel be justified in taking the confession of an invalid and baptizing him if he is not able to go into the water of himself? J. P. F.

We see nothing objectionable in this mode of procedure. The only doubtful point is the effect which the shock of the water may have upon one who is so frail that he cannot walk and this is a question for the physician to decide in the individual case.

Is our church purely congregational in government? Who elects the Board and what are its duties? Subscriber.

Yes, the churches of Christ are purely congregational in government; that is, they recognize no legislative authority over the congregation. Our national missionary organizations do not conflict with congregational government because they are in no sense over the congregation, but represent all the congregations in work which cannot be carried on efficiently without co-operation. It would be entirely possible to extend our co-operative work much further without interfering with essentialiy congregational government. Presumably the "board" referred to is the local church board, composed of the officers of the congregation. It is elected by the members of the local church. Its duties depend upon what functions are committed to it by the congregation.

How do you harmonize Matt. 27:5 and Acts 1:18? Do both refer to the manner of death of Judas? J. L. T.

If it were not for the necessity of "harmonizing," it would doubtless have been assumed by all that each passage referred to the manner of Judas' death. Matthew says: "He went away and hanged himself." There is no room for reasonable doubt here, though, of course, it does not specify with judicial exactness that he was "hanged by the neck until dead." The account in Luke says that he obtained a field and "falling headlong he burst asunder in the midst." There are plenty of precipitous places near Jerusalem where one could get a fatal fall. It is customary to explain the discrepancy by supposing that Judas hanged himself on the edge of a precipice, and that the rope broke, in consequence of which he fell headlong. There is nothing impossible or inherently improbable in this arrangement. It does, however, require one to choose between two alternatives: Either the writer of Acts did not know about the hanging, or he exhibits here a lack of descriptive power which is not a general characteristic of his style. But is it so serious a matter if such discrepancies should remain unharmonized? Their value as evidences of the independence of the narratives, giving increased certainty of their truth where they agree, is greater than any danger which there may be in recognizing that the two writers recorded different accounts of the death of Judas.

Not to put the old question "Are we a denomination?" in that form, I would like to ask, what is the meaning of the familiar phrase, "We as a people?" What is a "people"? Alexander.

We are grateful to our querist for varying the form of the familiar question. It is much easier to define "people" than to define "denomination." A "people" is just a group of individuals having some sort of a common tie which gives occasion for grouping them together. The Russians, for example, are a "people" and their bond of unity is a matter of race, government and language. The bankers of this country are a "people" whose bond of unity is their common business. The Odd Fellows are a "people" united by the ties of a fraternal organization. The Baptists, Presbyterians and Disciples are "peoples" each united in the bonds of a common religious faith. To be a "people" is to be a group of men and women having toward each other certain relations which they do not have toward outsiders. It involves no implication as to whether this separation from outsiders is a good thing or a bad thing, or whether the praise or blame for this separateness belongs to the people or to the outsiders. In view of this fact, most of our writers have chosen to designate the Disciples of Christ by this very non-committal term, "people." Is there any reason in the nature of the case why the term "denomination" should not be used in an equally non-committal sense to designate a people who, having undoubtedly a separate existence, want some way of referring to themselves as a whole? Not necessarily. The word "denomination" has no more implications than the word "people." It has come, however, to have associations with a divided condition of christendom which we regard as evil and there is perhaps little to be gained by attempting to restore to its correct use a word which in its common acceptation refers to something with which we have no dealing. Let it stand that we are a "people" and as such we have a variety of names ("The Current Reformation," "Our Movement," "the Brotherhood," "We," "We as a People") but with any sort of denominationalism which acquiesces in the division between ourselves and other Christians as a normal and permanent arrangement we will have no dealings.

The Message of Carlyle

By PROF. WILLIAM D. HOWE

Were we asked the question, Who in the field of English letters in the nineteenth century were the most individual figures? many of us would answer Carlyle and Browning. If the question read, "the two greatest figures," many of that number would reaffirm their reply, treating the two queries as synonymous. Some would take the middle ground and would simply maintain that the influence of these men was profound in stimulating and shaping the thought of the century. Of the two men the influence of Carlyle was the more comprehensive, the more extensive, that of Browning the more intensive and certainly the more permanent.

Those who see in the phrase, "literature and life" something more than a mere hackneyed couplet or euphemism will turn to the work of these two men, so alike and yet so different, with a desire to discover what of vital interest remains after a lapse of one or two generations. In our present discussion we shall confine our attention to Carlyle.

Carlyle is a peculiar product of the eighteenth century. His philosophy was largely of that period. The men who chiefly attracted him were of that time, yet in his conception of history and of nature he is peculiarly modern. Carlyle's main inheritance from the passing century is a pseudo-philosophical attitude of mind which is the directing power through his entire life. He cannot outline a consistent system of philosophy. He does not reveal a mine of original thought, but he furnishes the best by which the ore already mined may be smelted. To use an unfortunate popular distinction he stimulates rather the reader of philosophy than the student of philosophy. His power is moral and spiritual rather than intellectual, the enkindling of enthusiasm rather than furnishing the mind with nourishment.

Carlyle is less original than Browning; less penetrating but more intelligible. He is more forcible, more rugged—shall we say more masculine?—than Wordsworth. He is more visibly in earnest than Tennyson; more passionate; he stimulates thought while Tennyson reflects thought. Thus the "In Memoriam," better than any other work bears the stamp of the intellectual activity of the middle of the nineteenth century. If these observations be correct, Carlyle may be considered a master spirit of the century.

The life of Carlyle properly divides itself into three periods. The first, his boyhood, closing with the years at Edinburgh University. In this period he breathes deeply of the clear atmosphere of Scotland, especially of the land of Burns. Into his very life are wrought the strict laws of Scotch Presbyterianism, the spirit of which never leaves him. The second period is filled with the greatest struggle. To find a suitable environment for this inner conflict which he knew must come, he withdraws to the lonely little farm at Craigenputtock. There he can draw close to nature and thereby temper some of the experiences of the soul. From this struggle he comes forth stronger in his faith in God. These years of introspection find an ardent expression in the pages of "Sartor Resartus." We may consider the last period as an application of the principles of life which he evolved in the years of seclusion at Craigenputtock.

From these periods there results a life of depth, of earnestness, fully alive to the needs of the time, untiring in its effort to help men. Call him what you will, you cannot deny to Carlyle the passion of earnestness, for to him it was a passion. He is desperately in earnest in his insistence on certain things. What are those things? In other words, what is his message?

1. The dignity of work. With a clear ring Carlyle exhorts us to work in the sweat of our brows. Labor is once more freed from the stigma which the aristocratic eighteenth century had put upon it. Work is the essence of duty, the first step to religion. He inveighs against Dilettantism, because Dilettantism is synonymous with "Donothingness." "Nobility lies in valiant suffering for others, not in slothful making others suffer for us." The leaders of industry are to him the "captains of the world." "It is to you I call, ye know at least this, That the mandate of God to His creature man is: Work!" In offering consolation to Goethe on the death of his son, he says "our hope and comfort is 'to work while it is called to-day,'and so Forward! Forward!" In his essay on the negro, "Whatsoever prevents a man from this his sacred appointment, while he lives on earth—that, I say, is man's deadliest enemy." "The latest gospel in this world is 'know thy work and do it.'" "Laborare est orare. Work is worship."

"Know'st thou Yesterday, its aim and reason,
"Work'st thou well To-day, for worthy things,
"Calmly wait the Morrow's hidden sorrow,
"Need'st not fear what hap so e'er it brings."

This gospel of labor is pervasive in the writings of Carlyle and can scarcely be distinguished from the same gospel of Ruskin.

2. Protest against "mechanism," materialism, or what may be called to-day commercialism. "It is the age of machinery in every outward and inward sense of that word; the age, with its whole undivided might, forwards, teaches and practices the great art of adapting means to ends." "Men are grown mechanical in head and in heart, as well as in hand." There are the two natures of man, according to Carlyle—the dynamical and the mechanical. "But though mechanism, wisely contrived, has done much for man in a social and moral point of view, we cannot be persuaded that it has ever been the chief source of his worth or happiness. . . . The truth is, men have lost their belief in the Invisible and believe and hope and work only in the Visible, or to speak it in other words, this is not a religious age. . . . It is no longer a worship of the Beautiful and the Good; but a calculation of the Profitable. . . . Our Deity is Mechanism." "That all Godhead should vanish out of men's conception of the universe seems to me precisely the most brutal error that men could fall into."

This protest against materialism leads first, to deeper love of nature, to a clearer recognition of the great mystery in the world and, second, to the firmer trust in the dignity of man. As one of the many illustrations of the first point,take the following sentence from a letter to Emerson (1837) "I rejoice much in the glad serenity of soul with which you look out on this wondrous Dwelling-place of yours and mine—with an ear for the Ewigen Melodien which pipe in the winds round us and utter themselves forth in all sounds and sights and things; not to be written down by gamut-machinery." In regard to the second point, he says, "We have a faith in the imperishable dignity of man; in the high vocation to which throughout this his earthly history, he has been appointed." Further Emerson says, "The doctrine is indeed true and grand which you preach as by cannonade, that God made a man, and it were as well to stand by and see what is in him."

3. To most readers, Carlyle stands as the apostle of sincerity, faith; the protestor against quackery, shams, cant. One of his most popular and most stimulating books, "Heroes and Hero-worship," is based on the sincerity which must be inherent in the great man. Carlyle treats the hero as divinity, prophet, poet, priest, man of letters, king. To him a man is a hero in the proportion that he has sincerity, the basis of his religion. In a letter to Emerson he says, "Meanwhile I know no art of much consequence except that of believing, of being sincere; from Homer and the Bible down to the poorest Burns' song, I find no other art that promises to be perennial." How earnestly Carlyle preaches this gospel comes out in his words to Emerson. "Innumerable men give their lives cheerfully to defend Falsehoods and Half-falsehoods, why should not one writer give his life cheerfully to say in plain Scotch-English, in the hearing of God and man,'To me they seem false and half-false'? At all events, thou seest, I cannot help it. It is the nature of the beast."

This passionate desire to look below the mere exterior to the real inspired in him a love of history. History becomes to him a record of life—"the message, verbal or written, which all mankind delivers to every man." So the "History of the French Revolution" is not an account of senate-houses or battlefields, but the dramatic portrayal of life. Prejudiced, inaccurate, superficial that great work may be, but it is the most eloquent and most thrilling record of the great struggle of modern history.

4. Above all and through all is his abiding faith. Never does he lose the spirit of Scotch Presbyterianism which he received from his mother at Ecclefechan. Everywhere he insists on belief, belief with the whole soul. He never clearly enunciates his conception of God or of any great religious principle, but no one doubts that he holds Puritanically to a Supreme Being. This abiding faith is always accompanied by a most humble submission. Carlyle's understanding of duty implied work and submission, and duty in this sense is synonymous with religion. To Emerson he writes (1835) "My belief in a special Providence grows yearly stronger, unsubduable, impregnable." The foundation of his faith is laid on silence or solitude. To them he goes for comfort, "The great silence of Earth was as balm to this weary, sick heart of mine." "Silence is the element in which great things fashion themselves together. . . . Thought will not work except in silence." "I say it is right and fitting that one be left entirely alone with one's grief and sins, with the mysterious ancient Earth round one, the Everlasting Heaven over one. . . Yesterday, one of the stillest Sundays, I sat long by the side of the swift river Nith; sauntered among woods all vocal only with rooks and passing birds."

Thus the words of Carlyle have spoken for him. Is this the gospel of despair? Is it the doctrine of skepticism or atheism? Do these words give hope to the ascetic? Are they not rather most vigorous words, most inspiring words to the young man of high hopes and unselfish ambitions? They sound a message as clear and as genuine as any that man ever uttered. They are not for the nineteenth century alone, but are as well for the twentieth century.

It will be long before the appeal, so eloquently voiced in the following words, shall have lost its power: "But it is to you, ye workers . . . that the whole world calls for new work and nobleness. Subdue mutiny, discord, widespread despair, by manfulness, justice, mercy and wisdom. Chaos is dark and Hell is deep; let light be and there is instead a green, flowery world. Oh! it is great and there is no other greatness. To make some work of God's creation a little fruitfuller, better, more worthy of God; to make some human heart a little wiser, usefuller, happier—it is a work for a God." "Let us do it like soldiers, with submission, with courage, with a heroic joy, 'whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might.'"

English Topics.

Henry Varley Among Us.

One of the most intimate and esteemed friends of Dr. W. T. Moore, of myself, and of many others sharing in our good work is Henry Varley, who has for a whole generation been one of the world's most active and renowned evangelists. Mr. Varley recently paid one of his visits to America, and now he is sojourning once more for a short period among us. He lives, as most of my readers probably know, in Australia, having left England for that country about ten years ago. He is a man of magnificent physique, stout, burly and muscular; yet, like many such stalwart people, he cannot stand the English climate, through a proclivity to bronchitis. Strong men have their weak spots. It was a shock for me and Dr. Moore when one day Mr. Varley came into the Christian Commonwealth office and informed us that the doctor had assured him that his life would be at stake if he remained in England. He must hasten away to some warm and dry climate. Accordingly he told us he was hurriedly breaking up his London home and would start in a few days for Australia, taking with him all his family. Thus we lost one of the ablest preachers to the common people London has had in our time. Henry Varley has been in England for two different seasons since he became a Colonial, and now he is transiently with us again. He is, as usual, letting the public know he is here, simply by his extraordinary power. He is not a genius exactly, but exercises much more immediate influence on the masses than any man of genius seems ever to exert. Plant him before an assembly and they are magnetized in thirty seconds. In London he is especially effective, because he used for about twenty years to be popularly known as the "Butcher's Evangelist." Brought up in a humble village home near Liverpool, he went to London to be a butcher's lad. Here he courted his master's daughter, but was not allowed to prosecute his suit, the young lady's father insisting upon his attainment of a competent position in life before pressing his claim. He went off to Australia, prospered well, though only a youth, came home, reentered the trade in London, married the girl of his choice, became a leading mastertradesman and while still in business built the West London Tabernacle and preached regularly in it. Few preachers have incorporated so much of realistic romance in their early lives. The constant claims and calls on his time and energy as a preacher led Henry Varley to give himself up to the work of an evangelist, in which he has few equals. He is connected with no particular society, but is an absolutely Free Lance, though he is much more in sympathy, theologically speaking, with the Disciples of Christ than with any other people.

The Kaiser Shines.

We do not know what to think about that extraordinary man, the Emperor of Germany. The Emperor Louis Napoleon used to be called "The European Sphinx" but Kaiser Wilhelm II is quite as inscrutable a person. He has been mourning Queen Victoria with sincerity, and with an earnestness of demonstration so pathetic as to have elicited grateful admiration in this country. He hurriedly left Germany in the very midst of the stirring and ostentatious celebration of the Prussian Bicentenary, in order to be in Osborne before the death of Queen Victoria. His behavior has been altogether impressive. But it is impossible to forget that this same Teuton autocrat did more than all other statesmen together to prevent the interruption, time after time, during a dreadful period of three years, of the infernal massacres in Armenia. Very soon after that orgie of blood and rapine ceased, the Kaiser visited Constantinople, kissed the Sultan on both cheeks, and allowed the Kaiserin Augusta to lean on Abdul Hamid's arm. And there is no sign at all of any repentance. The Sultan still books in the favor of Germany. His army defeated the Greeks simply because it was carefully trained by German officers. But I sometimes find myself face to face with insoluble problems. The Kaiser is an incarnate enigma, and I give up in despair the conundrum constituted by his conduct. His policy is one ever-flickering phantasmagoria of what the mathematicians call permutations and combinations. Such men seem at one time to be a tower of strength. At other times their friendship is a delusion and a snare.

A Perilous Alliance.

This leads me to express regret that nearly every day I see ominous allusions to a supposed secret Anglo-German alliance. Lord Salisbury has indeed done an evil thing if he has covertly compacted any kind of treaty between Britain and Germany. We need, and must secure, the lasting friendship of our Teuton cousins. But we should keep totally clear of entangling alliances with any of the continental powers. They are all more or less deeply committed to a policy of imperialist militarism. I believe in imperialism where it is identical with spontaneous expansionism and is controlled by a Christian humanitarianism actuating its policy. And I believe in militarism where it is the resultant of all the democratic forces of freedom, and where it is actuated by the resolve of a free nation to defend its independence. But all Christian men and women must repudiate any type of imperialist militarism which is founded on the principles of either King David or of Machiavelli. King David brought woe on his people because he and they yielded to the imperialism of the cruel, aggressive spirit. He instituted a census, not for the purpose of numbering the people for information or in the interests of political economy, but to ascertain how many soldiers he could muster for the subjugation of surrounding independent tribes. And modern Machiavelianism is the mainspring of the international life of the European continent. It is deceitful, ambitious, envious, devilish. It deals in artful intrigues and makes of diplomacy a black occult art. It sets Russia, Germany, Austria, France and Italy conspiring and plotting behind each other's backs. It looks for a fearful coming crash and prepares prodigious arsenals for the approaching Armageddon. It is promoting that shameful conspiracy in France, now permeating, against the beneficent Republic, and threatens shortly to bring in the Bonapartists. That is the meaning of this agitation respecting the religious associations. They are going to kill France if the government cannot scotch them. Spain is in throes of agony through the reaction against that clericalism which never closes its serpent's eyes. And behold, the little nations are plunging into the caldron. Bulgaria, Servia, Roumania, Macedonia, are seething with commotion. The Eastern Question is bubbling up. Now Germany is dangerously situated in relation to this complication of most antichristian elements. She is the European center of gravity. Her army is the terror of Europe. She is exposed to the most critical perils. Her emperor has compromised with massacre and has condoned the most diabolical crime of modern history. Therefore, I pray that England may never be allied politically with her or any other European power. I repeat my aspiration so often expressed: when we do contract any alliance, let it be with America, in order that there may be compacted that grand Anglo-Saxon confederation which alone will save the liberties of the race. I do not know how many of my American friends ponder the position, or grasp the possibilities of the near future. But some of us on this side of the water are convinced that the world-wide ungodliness of the great nations, the apostasies of the great national churches, the chicanery of diplomatists, and the ambitions of despots will ere long provoke a hurricane of wrath divine on all the refuges of human haughtiness and strength.

Reformation and Restoration

By M. E. HARLAN

"O Lord, make me a better man," prayed Alexander Pope. "It would be easier to make a new man," replied his page.

Because of the difficulty in reforming an old and corrupt church by any one within its ranks, denominationalism was born. But instead of making a new church it would be much better to restore the old original apostolic church. A reformer is a voice from within a body calling upon it to change itself, but the larger part of the body being corrupt this voice is made impotent because it has no clean place within to which it can invite. The restorationist is a voice from without saying, "Come ye out from among them, make you clean." And so to its own clean platform, not made by its own counsel but taken from the hands of the original designer, it invites all who honor truth and right to come.

Luther spent all the earlier part of his eventful life trying to reform the Catholic Church regarding auricular confession, purgatory and papal absolution. But he was forced to abandon this hopeless task and at the Diet of Spires in 1526 it was openly decreed that no reform or change should be inaugurated. The Catholic Church at most is but a man-made or, worse still, a priest-made institution and when you reform a priest-made church you still have a priest-made church and it is better to restore the church that existed before Catholicism was known. By bitter experience Luther learned that he must get back of Catholicism, and attempted to restore some of the apostolic order of things. He thus became the index finger of God pointing the people to an open but neglected Bible. At times, with a force born of despair, he plead for primal things and tried to restore the Bible name for God's people, and even plead for the people to call themselves "Christians" instead of Lutherans.

We cannot reform the teachings of Christ and the apostles. They don't need reforming or changing. But we can restore them. We cannot reform the creed of the apostolic church and we need not bother about making a new one. But we can restore the original. The papal dogma that the Bible receives its authority and authenticity from the church does not need to be reformed. It must be abrogated and in its stead the original teaching must be restored, i. e., the church receives her authority from God's word.

Wesley scarcely made an attempt at restoration. He was a reformer and lived and died in the Church of England trying to reform it. Only once did he approach the plainly marked border land of "restoration" and that was when, becoming tired of denominationalism and bigotry, he cried out, "Would to God that all party names and unscriptural phrases and forms were forgotten!" But he spoke better than he knew in this negative appeal for an old order of things.

The little ripple started by Luther on the sea of religion became the mighty tide that threatened to engulf all man-made barks that had been launched by loving but misguided hands. In 1807, when Thomas Campbell gave to the world his famous "Declaration and Address," he sounded the first clear note that called the attention of the world, not to the reformation of man-made institutions, but to the restoration of a Christ-founded church with its rites and ordinances and life. He would lead not back to Augsburg or Westminster, but back to Christ and Jerusalem where "the law went forth from Zion and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem."

One ringing article in that famous address reads as follows: "That this society, formed for the sole purpose of promoting simple, evangelical Christianity, shall to the utmost of its power countenance and support such ministers and such only as exhibit a manifest conformity to the original standard in conversation and doctrine, in zeal and diligence; only such as reduce to practice that original form of Christianity expressly exhibited on the sacred page, without attempting to inculcate any thing of human authority, of private opinion or invention of men as having any place in the constitution, faith or worship of the Christian Church, or any thing as matters of Christian faith or duty for which there cannot be expressly produced a 'Thus saith the Lord' either in express terms or approved precedent."

If Luther was the index finger pointing to an open and neglected Bible, Campbell was the voice of God calling to restore "all things according to the pattern shown" us in that book. Luther's work was largely a protest as expressed by the word Protestantism. It was more destructive than constructive. Campbell's work was a protest but much more than a protest. His work was constructive. When he cried against sectarianism he at the same time pointed to the remedial prescription in the original documents.

A restorationist is not an originator, but an explorer. The Campbells and their successors originated no new truth; they discovered old truths. A reformation of the sects would not destroy sectarianism; but a restoration to the divine order or pattern would leave not a vestige of sectarianism. If Luther was a fire on the hill of sacrifice, the Campbells under the glare of that light were surveyors commissioned of God searching for and finding the original boundaries and lines of his kingdom on earth. The very fact that they were engaged in a restoration movement forced them to examine original titles and specifications pertaining to the inheritors. They did not claim to originate plans, but they declared the discovery of apostolic plans.

So far as I know they and their successors have been the only people who have come before the world with a well defined plan for the union of God's people. Others have felt the need of it and have been bold to speak of it, but they seem to be walking in a hazy atmosphere and have no detailed plan for its accomplishment. But the plan of these restorationists was and is not to reform man-made churches, but to restore the body of Christ to its rightful owner. In keenness of intellect, in Christly life, in sweep of vision, no reformer ever excelled the early leaders of the restoration movement. The bride (which is the church) had been kidnapped, stolen, and the laws for her conduct were being made by her bigoted, fallible captors. Our fathers were not willing to reform her and leave her to her merciless and licentious captors, but with a firm hand would restore her to her Lord who is capable of making all laws that relate to her conduct. And she will be happy in this restoration. Then restoration adds force to reformation and leaves it secure. Then ours is better than a reformatory movement. It is a restoration movement. All honor to its leaders.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

The next International Sunday-school convention will be held in Denver in 1902. The people of Denver are beginning to get ready for the great convocation. This will be the first religious convention to meet in this city. Other great conventions have met in the beautiful capital of the Rocky Mountain region, but they were secular in character. If the Christian people of Denver are already preparing to receive you, it is not too early for you to begin to make your arrangements to come and enjoy our hospitality. Come out to Denver and meet the largest-hearted men and women to be found on the continent.

The next meeting of the International Sunday-school lesson committee will be held in New York, April 17. If you have any suggestions to make to this committee (and criticisms and suggestions are invited) send them to the Rev. A. E. Dunning, D. D., 14 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass., the secretary of the committee. This committee very earnestly desires to bring the Sunday-school lessons to as high a degree of perfection as possible. Assistance in this work from any quarter will be welcome. The lessons for 1904 will be considered at the approaching meeting.

Yes, I know something about "The Twentieth Century New Testament." Its publication is incomplete. The work will be complete in three parts. Part one contains the five historical books; part two contains Paul's letters to the churches; part three has not been published. "The Twentieth Century New Testament" is an English enterprise. It is published in America by the Fleming H. Revell Company. The translators aim to present the thought of the writers of the New Testament in modern English. The translation is made from Westcott and Hort's text. The work claims to be neither a revision nor a pharaphrase, but a translation. The King James version was a revision of previous translations.

The revised version, as the name implies, is a revision of the King James version. "The Twentieth Century New Testament" claims to be, not a revision but a translation of the Greek New Testament into present-day English. The English is decidedly British. It is not good American English. The value of coins is given in pounds, shillings and pence. It is doubtful if, for the average reader, this is an improvement on the King James New Testament. In this publication the effort is, after grouping the books of the New Testament, to put them in their chronological order. The order of the historical books is Mark, Matthew, Luke, John, Acts. The order of "Paul's letters to the churches" is Thessalonians, Romans, Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians. These letters are arranged in three groups. The first group contains the epistles to the Thessalonians; the second contains the letter to the Romans, with the epistles to the Corinthians; the third contains the epistles to the churches in Ephesus, Philippi and Colosse. No account is taken in "The Twentieth Century New Testament," as far as it has been published, of Paul's letters to individuals—to Timothy, Titus and Philemon. The epistle to the Hebrews is, of course, not counted as one of Paul's letters to the churches. It is not probable that when the translators, in the prosecution of their work, come to Hebrews they will regard Paul as its writer.

I said above that "The Twentieth Century New Testament," in its English, is decidedly British. Wherever the word "got" can be introduced the translators invariably use it. The angel of the Lord told Joseph, the reputed father of Jesus, to "get up and take the child," and "Joseph got up." On the death of Herod an angel of the Lord appeared to Joseph in Egypt and said, "get up and take the child," and once more "Joseph got up." Jesus "got up" and spoke to the storm on the sea and there was a calm. The healer said to the paralytic "get up and go home," and the poor fellow "got up and went home." Jesus said to Matthew "follow me" and "Matthew got up and followed him." The woman who had spent her income on physicians for a dozen years and grew worse all the time "got well" when Jesus spoke to her. Jesus took the hand of the dead daughter of Jairus "and she got up." Jesus "got up" and followed the ruler of the synagogue. In the parable of the sower, the seed which fell among the thornbushes "shot up." One would think that this seed also ought to have "got up." The "blades of corn" in the parable of the tares also "shot up." "Jesus made the disciples get into a boat" and "when they had got up into the boat, the wind dropped." "When they had got up" is fine! "Peter got down from the boat and walked on the water." "Jesus got into the boat and went to the neighborhood of Magadan." "It is easier for a camel to get through the eye of a needle," etc. "Having got as far as Bethphage," Jesus sent two of his disciples. The master of the marriage supper sent out his invitations saying, "I have got my feast ready." The servants went out and got together all the people." When our Lord was on trial before Pilate the governor's soldiers "got the whole regiment round him." It is probable that you have got enough of this from "The Twentieth Century New Testament."

John the Baptist is represented as saying: "I, for my part, baptize you in water to teach repentance." Matthew is represented as saying that "the crowd was greatly struck" with the doctrine of Jesus when they heard "The Sermon on the Hill." When Jesus expelled the demons from the man of Gadara the evil spirits begged Jesus "to send them into the drove of pigs"; so the demons "went into the pigs." The parables of our Lord are spoken of as "stories." "Another story which he told them was this." "This was another story which Jesus related," etc., etc. His disciples came to him saying, "explain to us the story of the tares." In Matthew's account of the crucifixion, the following words are found: "However another man took a lance and pierced his side; and water and blood flowed from it."

The following is new in Mark 16:

A LATE APPENDIX.

"But all that had been enjoined on them they reported briefly to Peter and his companions. Afterwards, Jesus himself sent out by them, from east to west, the sacred and imperishable proclamation of enduring Salvation."

The baptismal formula in Matthew 28 reads: "Baptizing them into the Faith" (capital F) "of the Father, the Son, and the holy Spirit" (small h).

The gospels in "The Twentieth Century New Testament," are funny, and Paul's letters to the churches are warranted to cure Chronic Insomnia.

It is pleasant to hear that you are interested in the work of the Disciples in Denver.

The corner stone of the Central Christian Church, Sixteenth and Lincoln Avenues, was laid Lord's day afternoon, March 10, with appropriate ceremonies, Judge I. E. Barnum presiding. Dr. C. M. Cobem, of the Trinity Methodist Church, gave a fine address. He spoke of what this church will stand for. But few, if any, Disciples could have better represented the Christian Church. Bruce Brown also delivered a brief address. Judge Barnum in the beginning of the exercises indulged in interesting reminiscences. He was present at the laying of the corner stone of the former Central Christian Church building eighteen or twenty years ago. Bro. Brown, in his remarks, left the impression that this congregation proposes in the future to be an institutional church. Judge Barnum spoke of the peculiar fitness of the present pastor, Bruce Brown, for that kind of work. The completion of this building will be a notable addition to the ecclesiastical architecture of Denver. The money needed to pay for this future new home of the Central Church has been pledged. It only remains to secure five or six thousand dollars to pay for the furnishing. In the midst of the building enterprise the congregation is paying current expenses and aiding the missionary cause. Bro. Brown and those who co-operate with him are full of courage. The success of the Central Church in Denver means more than I can express for the work of the Disciples in all this region. The next annual meeting of the Colorado Christian Missionary Society will be held in the new Central Christian Church.

The LEXINGTON CONGRESS: A Prophecy

By CHARLES FORSTER

The great generalizations of the last century dealt almost exclusively with the materialistic, leaving out the higher system known through divine revelation. Spencer's definition of ultimate philosophy is a "completely unified knowledge," in contrast with a "partially unified knowledge." Spencer does not strive to attain this end, for his philosophy is only partially unified, inasmuch as he excludes the supernatural from his generalizations. The Lexington Congress is a step towards this ultimate truth, because it endeavors to unify the attained knowledge of material things with the revealed knowledge of heavenly things.

The coming congress is a prophecy, it is a germ of greater things. The pentecostal truth we claim to understand is the only revealed system that can be harmonized with attained systems, and during the early days of this new era we meet to harmonize them. We meet with a new resolution, with a new hope, and by the grace of God we will attain our object. It is not Utopian to say that the Disciples of Christ will be the leaders of thought during this twentieth century, for if they are not, the ultimate truth will be that much farther off.

If the complete unification which constitutes philosophy is ever attained, it must be done by the blending of partial unifications that have proved themselves to be true. The philosophers of the last century established the truth of great generalizations in the material world, and the Disciples of Christ have re-instated the great generalization of the spiritual world. The blending of these partially unified systems into one system is left to the followers of the Man of Nazareth.

We accept the great discoveries of philosophy and we accept the gospel. We also believe that there is but one universal and divine system, a belief that necessitates the unification of all truth, i. e., the blending into one harmonious system all knowledge attained and revealed. The antagonism between these different branches of knowledge is only apparent, and the certainty of the way out encourages us to search for it. As Disciples of Christ it is our duty to do this, and though many of our brethren brand such a study as tinged with skepticism, those who have undertaken it experience a deeper thrill of divine knowledge.

It is to be hoped and prayed for that many congresses of our people will meet for the purpose of dealing with these profound questions. The proposed study of "evolution and its bearing upon religious and theological problems" is only a start, but it is a start. Christian congresses are needed, congresses led by men who have dug deep, men who, after they have attained a crude knowledge of things, carry it to the throne of grace, allowing God to form it into an harmonious whole. This congress, therefore, is to be a fitting commencement for the new era, in which we pray that our eyes may behold a decided step toward the unification of all truth.

The Basis of Faith.

Charles Lloyd Garrison.

It can hardly have escaped the notice of the observant that the religious world at the present time is ripe for the scientific treatment of a most important question, which we as a people are peculiarly fitted to consider, namely: Is there an inherent or ecclesiastical necessity for the possession of objective norms? To this question, whose importance can scarcely be exaggerated, we have responded with an "Everlasting No." Germinant from this response and the wherefore of it we have grown up into a significant brotherhood, the doings of which are no longer confined to a corner. It may be said that we have demonstrated a proposition which has received as yet no adaquate statement, for the most sanguine of us would scarcely aver that our literary beginnings are commensurate with the genius and dignity of our plea. Not that these beginnings are devoid of merit—foremost of which must be reckoned promise; not that they are one whit less mature than might have been expected of an undeveloped people—for the order of development is first brawn, then brain: but that they fail adequately to report us on this most fundamental proposition is patent. We have hardly removed the possibility of being misunderstood and misrepresented by our nearest religious neighbors, much less have our representatives in the council of the world's scholarship thus far gained a hearing on this measure. That the time is ripe for a scientific handling of this problem, none can deny; that we have an abundance of material that needs only the genius of a master mind to work up into demonstrative proof, is incontrovertible; that the timely forthcoming of such a work would be like peaceful counsel to the troubled waves of ecclesiastical thought, is more than probable.

Our negative response to this fundamental question is full of historic significance and interest. It marks the birth of a new idea; the inception of a new principle. It carries with it a tremendous assumption, to be sure, postulating of the church a power which has been denied to it ever since the beginnings of her apostasy, i. e., the power of perpetuity and growth apart from a formulated creed. Thus far the assumption has been vindicated by the facts of experience; how the enterprise will fare in the future, and what its bearings will be upon the perennial problem of Christian Union, are questions of related interest.

Without denying the essential originality and feasibility of the solution rendered by the leaders of the restoration movement of this important problem, it must be conceded that its public enunciation had been foreshadowed by many fruitless attempts at an analogous solution, which, without exception, swept round from negation to affirmation. Is this tendency inevitable? Its early manifestation and persistent recurrence are at least favorable to such a view. Certain it is that this tendency toward schematism in matters of doctrine is not without its explanatory causes. They may be sought in the predilection of mind—in the development of which the legal religion and hierarchy of the Old Testament exerted an influence by no means inconsiderable—for authorized forms in the materials of faith, practice, and constitution; but for the most part they are discernible in reactionary tendencies occasioned by partisan extremists. Thus the ultra-Pauline Antinomianism, in the early days of the church, doubtless had much to do with the transformation of the subjective conceptions of the apostle into objective norms. And for one reason or another the same thing has been taking place ever since.

In like manner, and for reasons which may be traced by the student of church history, the fundamental doctrines of ecclesiastical sanction were developed and elaborated by Christian thought in the Patristic Period until they finally crystallized into positive dogmatics, becoming the ground of contest between heresy and orthodoxy, and furnishing points of union and departure. Precisely the same process, with its attendant evils, is traceable from Luther's faith to Luther's Articles of Faith, and from Luther's Articles of Faith to the symbols of the Lutheran Church. Some of its alleged advantages are:

(a) Facility in differentiation and promulgation. With a schematized code of authoritative sanction it is very easy to draw the line of demarcation between the orthodox and the heterodox; while a clear-cut scientific statement of dogma, resting upon a clear-cut scientific statement of philosophical principles more readily promulgates itself than a mass of disassociated doctrines.

(b) The inherent love of the mind for order and precision. To the student of philosophy and religion nothing is more apparent than this partiality of the mind for system. For the purpose of examination and exposition it is desired to see the entire system of philosophy or religion as it lay pictured in the mind of its author or authors. Is the religion of Christ susceptible of scientific statement? So men have believed and taught. Witness their creeds.

(c) Preservation of the faith. Paul advises Timothy to refuse profane and old wives' fables, assuring him that the time would come when men would not endure sound doctrine; but having itching ears, would after their own lusts heap to themselves teachers; and would turn their ears from the truth unto fables. The Apostle Peter concedes that there are some things in the epistles of Paul which are hard to be understood, which the unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, unto their own destruction. This corruptive tendency finds its antidote in creed-building, which may be described as an effort on the part of man to preserve the doctrines of the church in their original purity.

This effort was prompted by the loftiest of motives. That it has signally failed of its purpose is not due to the lack of scholarship or of piety. It must be sought in the mode of its operation. Believing that they had discovered the fruitful source of past errors, the leaders of the restoration movement directed their efforts along a unique line. The significance of their work lies in the fact that they repudiated objective norms; that they denied the inherent and ecclesiastical necessity for the possession of them. It is the merit of their teaching, and the distinguishing mark of those who possess their spirit, that the individual is allowed the privilege of appropriating the subjective conceptions of the inspired writers. He is not required to approach the subjective through the avenue of the objective. On the other hand he is urged to go to original sources and draw individual conclusions, not in light of any prescribed philosophical system, nor in harmony with any stipulated dogmas, but in the light of his own reasoning and intuitional powers. Thus it will be seen there is given scope for infinite variedness and richness of find and expression. This certainly is a condition favorable to the realization of the highest truth in the highest form, and can hardly fail to have a most salutary influence upon our literary products when we shall have attained to maturity of development.

Yet our disclaiming a schematized code of essentials must rest upon something more convincing than the absence of a written creed. Even the oral presentation, as we understand them, of the authoritative conditions of salvation and the scriptural means of grace, strange to relate, has laid us liable to the charge of inconsistency; for, say our religious neighbors, preaching is defining, defining is schematizing, and schematism, deny it though you may, is individual creed-building. Every step, therefore, toward uniformity of doctrine is a step toward crystallization of dogma, hence a step toward that condition of things from which you avowedly shrink.

There is, fortunately, one important consideration which vitiates this argument and redeems us from the most flagrant inconsistency; namely, the doctrine which we preach, by the simplicity and scripturalness of its presentation, finds its mission in the promotion of Christ, our creed incarnate. Of the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, by the intellect apprehended and from the heart obeyed, "the pure, archetypal essence," in which its revelations to man and its requirements from man, which are subsumed under the concept, participate and find their enrichment, is Christ. Dynamically considered, this gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; but this power is not independent, inherent, underived, existent in cold, categorical propositions; for this would deify the gospel, apotheosize revealed truth, and restrict the sphere of its influence to the wisest of earth. Were the life-giving power of the gospel essence inmanent in a body of doctrine—whether as commands to be obeyed or propositions to be received—then it would become the duty of theology to reconcile this divine essence with the established and accepted doctrine of the Godhead and to supply a new interpretation of Calvary.

Is it not consonant with a better philosophy and a more lucid theology to believe and teach that the end of faith in the last analysis of it is not dogma, systematic or propositional, but rather Personality which dogma strives to set forth? The faith of the apostolic church was Christ and him crucified; the faith of an apostatized church was dogmatics and it glorified. The one produced loving, heartfelt allegiance to Christ which manifested itself in heroic service and redeeming martyrdom; the other fostered a languid, prescriptive faith, bereft of those virile and daring qualities which inspire courage, generate enthusiasm, promote self-renunciation and inaugurate crusades.

That we cannot know Christ apart from dogma is a truism; that we cannot preach Christ apart from doctrine is self-evident. Just as mental representations are necessary to produce knowledge of the outer world, so the facts of the gospel are necessary to make known the mind of Christ. But just as we discriminate between the mental representation and the objective reality, so we ought to discriminate between the facts of the gospel and the divine Personality which transcends those facts and breathes life and meaning into them.

Aesthetically and ethically considered, the gospel is perfect, because it contains the words of eternal life, and makes the way of salvation so plain that the wayfaring man, though a simpleton, need not err therein. Yet this perfection is not the perfection of an inherent essence, it is rather perfection in adaptation of means to end, perfection accruing from him who is the head of all principality and power. To Christ, the given reality, who stands back of the gospel and towers above it, the gospel is forever inferior. Just as the mind of Paul could not comprehend and report all of the mind of Christ, so the sum total of revealed truth is not commensurate with his greatness. For logical and ontological reasons are we not driven to the conclusion that neither a system nor a proposition is the object of faith, but rather the sublime Personality which stands back of both?

Unquestionably, if once we admit categorical truth, objectively contemplated and dogmatically stated, into the realm of required faith, the inexorable logical consequence will be a creed replete with the seeds of schism and strife. That it be unwritten is neither a sufficient disclaimer nor an evidence of merit. Rather otherwise. If our thinking is to be tyrannized over by a dogmatic code, tacitly agreed upon and rigidly enforced, it would bespeak better logic and more candor to come right out with a formal statement of the whole matter and thus add one failure more to the abortive struggles of the past. But that such a condition will ever be realized among us, or that such a repellent measure will ever be for a moment entertained, the very genius of our plea and the ever-increasing development of Christian liberality in our communion most assuredly controvert. Never before in our history as a people were our prospects writ so large. We have a message for the century upon which we are entering and, what is equally important, the century is ready for the message. One of the most significant tendencies of the day is the insistence everywhere making upon the person of Christ as an object of faith and a tenable basis of union. Nor is this one of the cant watch-cries of the day, as prognosticators of evil would have us believe; it is an evidence of unrest; it is the struggle of the mind for the final seat of authority; it is the cry of the heart for a deep-seated and vital communion with Christ. The assertion of individual right of thought is leading to the disintegration of formulated creeds and to the obliteration of sectarial lines. Just where this tendency will stop lies beyond the ken of man.

But not thus flecked with promise is the entire horizon of the future. Low-lying, ominous clouds are approaching. That the battle of the faith is to be fought out again at no far-distant day—and that, too, under conditions essentially different from any which have hitherto obtained—is the firm belief of those most capable of judging. Possibly there is now pending one of Teufelsdrockh's "Baphometic Fire-baptisms" through which Christendom is ordained to pass, and from which she shall emerge with her garments cleansed and her sceptre restored; but whatever the destructive and subsequent reconstituent process may be, may we not confidently hope to find Christendom in the end much nearer the truth than she has been for centuries, and therefore much more solidly united upon the vital elements of Christian fellowship and love?

Dogs in the Manger.

By H. C. Patterson.

There is not only a need for the gospel to be preached among the inhabitants of heathen lands, but there is a great need for its being preached in many places in our own fair land. The writer knows of scores of churches who are having no preaching, and where much good can be accomplished could the gospel be given to them. But it is a case of "dog in the manger" with them. They are too stingy to employ some one, and they will not allow one to come and preach, lest he, perchance, succeed in taking a few shekels out of the community.

I knew a good man, a splendid preacher and one among our best evangelists, to write to a score of pastorless churches offering to come and hold them a meeting, assuming all responsibility for support. In every case the answer was, "we are not able, and do not care to have a meeting just now." With me it has been a question as to what it is best to do in such cases. Their condition is more alarming than that of the heathen. Heathen doors are open to the missionary, while these pretending Christians will neither call a minister nor allow one to volunteer his services. In them is fulfilled the Saviour's declaration concerning the Pharisees, "hypocrites, for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men: for ye neither go in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering to go in."

Many officers of churches have conceived the idea that in them is vested all authority simply because of their position; that they can say "come, and he [the preacher] cometh; go, and he [the preacher] goeth." To me this is radically wrong. I think the doors of the church house should always be opened to any man of good character to proclaim the gospel. He may not be the one whom the officers would select; but he may be the one whom God has selected, and directed to that place to put the church to work and tell sinners the way to salvation.

Where a church has been without a pastor for some time and is inactive, any preacher has a perfect right to push himself in over the heads of the official board and, like the old prophets, thunder the needs of repentance into their ears saying "awake, thou that sleepest." When a good man proposes to come and preach it is the duty of the members to seize upon the opportunity, open their hearts and doors, take care of him, encourage and help him and thus God may bless and help the community.

If it were known that men would be welcomed to such places many of them would have preaching that have not had it for months or years. There are always men who are willing to sacrifice and take chances on remuneration and only ask "an open door" for doing good. Why not let them try?

The Heroism of Jesus.

By Stephen J. Corey.

These are stimulating days. Heroism is in the air. Its contagion is complete. In the palace or the cottage courage is extolled as the chief characteristic of manliness. At the sound of the war tocsin the youth of nations spring to the defense of home, country or suffering humanity without a thought of the cost. A few months ago our nation went wild over a man. From shore to shore of our land his name was acclaimed. His praise was upon every lip—and why? He was a hero. He had gained manly victory in a manly way. But we press our praise of courage to the verge of hero-worship, and our enthusiasm is easily punctured. Our hero transferred a grateful nation's gift to his wife, his ardent admirers became sick, and their small boys bombarded his triumphal arch with mud-balls. Extreme exaltation brings reaction—hero-worship satiates the worshiper and spoils the hero. Heroism never dies, but hero-ism must. We will forget the pageant and our admiral's mistake, but "Manila Bay" will never die.

But true heroism does not always find its manifestation in force. The voice of musketry and cannon does not alone speak of courage. The fiercest battles are not on blood-drenched fields, nor between the mighty engines of destruction which sail the sea. The greatest victories are over unseen enemies; the silent battling of the soul with temptation.

Jesus was a hero. He was a perfect man, and being that was perfect in manliness. Yet how seldom do people think of him as being heroic. We remember his meekness and forget his manliness. He is oftener the lamb than the lion. He was brought as a lamb to the slaughter but he is also that great shepherd of the sheep, fearless, intrepid, heroic. How vididly is this truth shown in our text, "And it came to pass, when the days were well-nigh come that he should be received up, he steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem."

The narrative is touching. It is the Master's final departure from Galilee. The scene of his greatest work must be left behind. He has counted the cost. Before him humiliation, bitterest agony and death. These words record the invincible firmness and heroic determination of the perfect man. Jesus is hurrying to his cross. Mark puts it even more graphically: "And they were in the way going up to Jerusalem; and Jesus went before them; and they were amazed; and as they followed they were afraid." Why the amazement on the part of the disciples? Why did they follow behind him fearing? Was there not something in that white, set face that told plainer than any words the awful determination of the Master? They had not seen him so before. He had been fearless, now he was heroic.

A critical analysis of the character of Jesus would be impossible. The attempt would be presumptuous. But may we not fairly ask, why was this action on the part of the Master heroic?

Jesus was tempted. He was divine but none the less human. That idea which denies his provocation to disobedience makes him unsympathetic and robs him of his manliness. "He was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." The Master's suffering was entirely voluntary, and therefore the test of opposing circumstances was all the more severe. Those conditions which were due to his humanity made his action on the occasion of our text doubly heroic.

Jesus loved intensely all those tender associations and conditions which make life beautiful and content. There was surely a deep pathos in the words uttered so soon after the events of this lesson: "The foxes have holes and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head." The home was sacred to Jesus and although his constant toil took him far from its pleasant peace, yet he was happy in the quiet abode of Martha and Mary or at the table of some kind host.

The time had come when all these things must be abandoned. "He steadfastly set his face to go unto Jerusalem." The fields and gardens, the brooks and vineyards, the hills of Galilee made sacred by the feet of expectant multitudes, must be left behind. No longer could he walk the shore of the peaceful sea or preach from its fishing boats. "No more crowds of simple fisher-folk hanging on his words and bringing their lame and sick to be healed by his loving hand." He must go—go and encounter the bitter opposition of the Scribes and Pharisees, and meet the lengthening shadow of the cross. Nor was this all. There were no words to cheer him, no friends to encourage. He must go without the approval of even his disciples—go to the chief city of his own people and there be crucified by those he came to save—slain by the beloved city over which he wept, for Jesus was a patriot.

Our Savior naturally shrank from the cross. He did not love suffering more than we. He had no passion for pain, no longing for the cross. He had rather teach in Galilee than suffer in Jerusalem. Martyrs have since gloried in their torture—Jesus did not. He rejoiced in the will of his Father, but not in the crown of thorns or the cruel nails. He was a hero, not a martyr. He "set" his face to go unto Jerusalem—he was hastening to his cross but not with pleasant indifference; his face was set like a flint—he had counted the cost. He "endured the cross, despising the shame." If he endured, it must have been hard—if he despised, it was something worthy of his scorn. Jesus shrank from the cross—the bloody sweat in the garden was not drawn by caprice, it was the anguish dew of Calvary. We not only shrink from the cross, but we hesitate—we turn from the bitter cup, and run away from that which is irksome. God give us courage to learn the lesson of the steadfast face.

But the humanity of our Savior was not all. He was divine and the privilege of divinity made his fearlessness all the more heroic. We hesitate to think of the divine element in Jesus as an actual limitation—but was it not so? What made possible his infinite humiliation? What was it that caused him to see the future, so that skull-crowned Calvary stood constantly before his vision? It was his divinity. How complete was the degradation of our Lord! The eternal Son of God walking to his death. The Creator of the universe hastening to be scourged and scoffed and spit upon. The perfect God, misunderstood, maligned and crucified. And in it all the future was distinct. He constantly walked in the shadow of the cross. How few of us could bear the petty trials which assail us if we knew they were coming. God has kindly hidden from us the future, that we faint not. The passion of Jesus was not confined to the last week of his life—the cross was his constant companion. In the midst of most congenial and peaceful circumstances he would stop and speak of it.

So we see that our Savior not only overcame attendant circumstances but he looked forward into the future and in spite of shame and suffering which awaited him, "he steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem." When there was everything to bind him back and nothing but the impulses of unselfish devotion to draw him onward, he faltered not in his work. His resolution was made conscious of his mission and determined to complete it.

Too often has the world believed that the church stood for imbecility and effeminateness rather than for strength and manliness. We need to proclaim the manly religion of the manly Christ. He was sublimely courageous and he calls for courage on our part. If we are true to our mission we will not lack opportunities for heroic action—it takes a man to follow Jesus—a man with a steadfast face. We may follow him amazed, we may not always understand the meaning of that determined countenance, but let us follow him who, when all earth's attractions were behind and only duty and death before, "steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem."

Exaggerated Humor, Conspicuous Inexactness or Lying—Which?

By F. D. POWER

The funny man has his perils. One who seeks to make men laugh is always tempted to go beyond proper bounds. And when one is paid so much a column for his humor he runs a greater risk of dullness on the one hand or extravagance on the other. A noted wit was completely discomfited when at a supper party the little girl of the hostess came with the message: "If you please, Mr. Blank, mamma sends her compliments and would be much obliged if you would begin to be funny."

Mark Twain, in his irresistible desire to create a cachinnation, and incidentally to earn a dollar, has overstepped the mark. His article in the February number of the North American Review does him little credit. "The Person Sitting in Darkness" seems to be Mr. Clemens himself. His caustic comments on civilization show him to be himself uncivilized, at least so far as to learn the full meaning of truth and justice. Lincoln's advice to Stanton would fit well here. The war secretary complained of the course of a certain officer and said he would give him a piece of his mind. "Do," said Lincoln. "Give it to him. Cut him all up." Stanton wrote the letter and submitted it to the President, and asked by whom he should it. "Send it?" said Lincoln. "Why, don't send it at all. You have freed your mind; now tear it up and throw it away. Don't send such letters. I never do."

It would have been well for the great humorist if he had taken this course with his last effusion. He uses Rev. W. S. Ament, a missionary of the American Board in China, as the text for a tirade of fourteen pages against missions and missionaries and the foreign policy of nations toward the uncivilized peoples which is amusing simply for its display of ignorance and prejudice without a single redeeming line of genuine humor. It affords the funny man a fine opportunity to use his power of satire, but the principal trouble with it is that the whole story is founded upon a statement that is utterly and colossally false.

The New York Sun published a dispatch declaring that Mr. Ament was collecting in Chinese villages thirteen times the actual losses of Christians and using the money thus collected in propagating the gospel. One who thought for a moment would at once decide that this was an impossible thing. How could a missionary, unless supported by an army, go about and despoil the people in this wholesale fashion? Mark, however, believes the newspapers like a good little boy. He himself is so veracious he would at once own up had he hacked his father's favorite cherry tree and he cannot in his innocency conceive that a newspaper would go wrong. So he dips his pen in vitriol and proceeds to stab this man Ament and all his ilk and through him Uncle Sam and John Bull and degenerate mankind generally. It is an awful arraignment, but it is all based upon an awful lie.

Seeing the dispach in the New York Sun and Times, the American Board telegraphed:

BOSTON, Feb. 18, 1901.

AMENT, PEKING.—Laffan's news agency reported in New York Sun, Dec. 24, you collecting thirteen times actual losses and using for propagating gospel. Are these statements true? Cable specific answer.

FERNSTALK, Boston.

To this came the following reply:

PEKING, Feb. 19, 1901.

FERNSTALK, BOSTON.—Statement untrue. Collected one-third for church purposes additional actual damages. Now supporting widows and orphans. Publication thirteen times, blunder cable. All collection received approval Chinese officials who are urging further settlement same line.

AMENT.

It seems Mr. Ament has succeeded in collecting actual losses suffered by native Christians and one-third additional toward the support of the widows and orphans of converts who have been massacred, and this has been done with the aid and approval of native officials. The Sun acknowledges its dispatch misrepresented the facts. The Times expresses its sincere regrets. The papers declare in most honorable way that Mr. Ament was meeting the approval of the Chinese commissioners, Li Hung Chang and Prince Ching, who have urged this method of settlement upon the local magistrates, and authorized the payment of 100 taels, about $140, for each Christian killed.

On this Mark founds his blast. It is terrifying, but not funny even a little bit. If the rest of his statements are as utterly base and baseless as this attack upon foreign missions, he would do well to come to Mt. Vernon and weep at the tomb of Washington.

Washington. D. C.

Current Literature.

Grant Allen's Paris, in two handy little volumes, attempts to occupy middle ground between the traveler's guide book, with its details about hotels and cabfares and its perfunctory double-starred appreciations, and the more free and flowing narrative or description of travel, which appeals most strongly to the reader who stays at home. The author's plan is to study the Paris of to-day as an embodiment of the history of that city. He is not interested in the Champs Elysees or the Eiffel Tower or the life of the cafes and boulevards, but is strong on Notre Dame and the Musee Cluny and the Louvre. The plan is thoroughly commendable and the convenient volumes will pay for the trouble of carrying them on a visit to Paris, but for the fireside traveler they would be of little use.

One could wish too that the author had been a trifle less explicit in telling us just where to stand, just which way to look and just what to admire. The collection of mediæval shoes in the Musee Cluny, for example, ranging from the tiniest satin slipper to the most enormous boot, is tersely condemned as "uninteresting." Yet many a traveler, who is but an indifferent admirer of Gothic carving, will get from these shoes a stimulus to the imagination which he will not get elsewhere. Why should he be headed off from them by the curt admonition that they are "uninteresting?" Again, when the author assures you that the interior of the Pantheon, though vast, is "unimpressive," he makes a statement which is unnecessary, if correct. The reader to whom this remark is addressed is supposed to be already in the Pantheon and if the hollow of its dome and the aspect of its frescoed walls do not impress him, he ought to be sensible of the fact without advice. But what of the unlucky traveler who discovers, when it is too late, that he is impressed by something which he is officially assured is unimpressive? He can only pass out in the hope that next time he will admire the thing which it is proper to admire and not be impressed by the unimpressive. One can easily be resigned to the author's use of approving stars and double-stars to mark the most notable objects (a la Baedeker) by reflecting upon the wilderness of adjectives which this simple expedient dispenses with. Still, it is a good book. If you are going to Paris take it; if not leave it alone. But in any case one must remember that it does not attempt to consider all phases of Paris and if one wants to know it as a modern city, a place where men are living to-day, rather than as a monument of past ages, one must find his information elsewhere. (L. C. Page & Co.)

One might almost think that Donald G. Mitchell had been the intimate contemporary of all the American men of letters from the landing of the Mayflower down to date, judging from the sprightly and familiar tone in which he speaks of them in his American Lands and Letters. As a matter of fact, there is almost no personal reminiscence in the book. The author excludes from his survey all writers whose birth-date falls later than the end of the eighteenth century, but even with this limitation there are many whose high time came after "Ik Marvel" had himself become a figure in the literary world. Yet he records no personal recollections beyond an account of a visit to Washington Irving at Sunnyside, and there is a facsimile of a note from Irving expressing his appreciation of "Dream Life"—which, by the way, he calls "The Dream of Life."

The author states as his purpose not to acquaint the reader in full with the history of American literature, but to stimulate an interest in it. The gossipy fashion in which he saunters through the field of American letters certainly accomplishes this end to a degree which completely justifies his effort, and in addition it paints a background for the literary characters which shows them in close relation to the social and political conditions of their times. There is, to be sure, a large amount of somewhat recondite information in the volume, but one instinctively thinks "What joy to prepare such a book!" rather than "What a task!"

The exclusion of the famous Massachusetts group of writers, the Cambridge and Concord coterie, whose birth-years are all on this side of 1800, gives opportunity for the somewhat earlier group of Connecticut writers, who are usually overshadowed, to receive the attention which they merit. Mr. Mitchell is a Yale man and a resident of New Haven and it doubtless afforded him satisfaction, as it will to many other Yale men, to note that in the eighteenth century New Haven was the literary capital of the new world. (Scribners)

Upon no subject in the realm of art have more books been written—and more good books—than on the Italian painters of the Renaissance. And yet it is almost impossible for any one to study the works of those masters for a few years with true interest and devotion without coming to the conviction that at least one more book is needed and at the same time developing the impulse to write it. For this very reason they are an uncommonly interesting group of books, these on the Italian artists, because most of them were irrepressible books, which the authors could not help writing, even though they knew that the public was not conscious of needing new works on the subject. Mr. Frank Preston Stearns, who has already written good books of literary criticism and at least two on Italian art, has recently published, under the title Four Great Venetians, an account of the lives and works of Giorgione, Titian, Tintoretto and Paolo Veronese. It may not suit the tastes of all of us to find Giovanni Bellini placed in a class secondary to Giorgione and it will impress almost any one who has gone through the Venetian Academy that Carpaccio deserves somewhat more generous treatment. Still, since the author professes to treat only of four particular Venetian painters, he is under no obligation to give a complete history of Venetian art or to devote to others an amount of space proportionate to their merits. The author has plenty of opinions of his own, which do not always coincide with the usual judgments of the older authorities, but he states them without arrogance and leaves the reader to accept them or not as he pleases. (Putnam's Sons, $2.)

The name of Archibald R. Colquhoun is well known to the readers of books on world politics and the problems of Asia. In the volume entitled "Russia Against India," recently noticed in this page, he dealt with Russian aggression in central, southern and western Asia and arrived at the conclusion that the progress of Russia here could only be checked by a British occupation of Afghanistan. In a larger and more pretentious book, entitled Overland to China, he deals chiefly with the relation of Russia to northern and eastern Asia. Though not, like the other, an argument in support of any specific policy, this book embodies the same conception of Russia as the most crafty and far-seeing of all the Powers and the most irresistible because of the patient tenacity with which she adheres to her plans for expansion. The overland route to China lies, of course, through Siberia and the bulk of the book is an account of Russia's acquisition of this vast territory and a description of it. The description is not highly picturesque but it is full of information for one who wishes to understand the country. (Harpers.)

F. B. Meyer's little volume entitled John the Baptist is just the sort of book which one would expect Mr. Meyer to write on that subject. It is a devotional study of the few recorded incidents in the life of the Forerunner. (Revell. $1.)

The tract on Christian Science, by E. P. Woodward, is a convincing exposition of its fraudulent character by one who has gone to the bottom of it. That is not far to go, it is true, for it is a shallow, though very muddy, delusion. Mr. Woodward's style is crisp and trenchant and his matter is sound and sensible. (Safeguard Pub. Co., Portland, Me. $ .10.)

The following pamphlets and tracts have been received: Annie Moore Cable; or, a Mind Destroyed Developing as a Medium, by Thomas Ingraham Moore. An exposition and denunciation of spiritualism. (Bradford, O., 25 cts.) Present Day Attitudes Toward the Bible, by Rev. George F. Ayers. A moderate, conservative statement of the case especially with reference to its bearing on the present controversy over the Westminster Confession in the Presbyterian Church. (L. F. Tromly, Poplar Bluff, Mo., 10 cts.) The Christian Principle of Sociology and its Application to Present-day Problems. A thesis presented by Rev. R. H. Crossfield for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in the University of Wooster. God's Purpose in this Age. For the most part a study from the prophetical portions of the New Testament. (Henderson & Co., Toronto, Canada, 10 cts.) The Satan of Scripture, by W. A. Mason. (Henderson & Co., 10 cts.) The Lessons of the Ages, by W. A. Mason. A survey of human history as divided into seven dispensations: the Edenic, ante-diluvian, post-diluvian, patriarchal, Jewish, church and millennium. (Henderson & Co., 10 cts.) The Thirteenth Annual Report of the Society for the Diffusion of Christian and General Knowledge Among the Chinese for the year ending Sept. 30, 1900. This report is chiefly occupied with an account of the anti-foreign crusade in China including the siege of the legations at Pekin.

Ladies in Mexico.

Undone By Coffee Poisoning.

Down in the City of Mexico, in the country that raises its own coffee, they have plenty of stomach trouble and nervous headaches brought on by coffee drinking.

A lady writing from there says, "I have used coffee for a long time and was inordinately fond of it. At any time I would cheerfully have given up all the balance of my meal if necessary, in order that I might have the coffee, but I acquired a wretched, muddy, blotchy complexion, had prolonged attacks of excruciating nervous headaches, was troubled with insomnia, and finally complete nervous prostration, that horror of horrors.

I was compelled to give up coffee for it was the poison that worked my undoing, then I concluded to take on Postum Food Coffee. I did not believe in it and knew I would not like it, for I could not bear to think of anything that was to take the place of my beloved coffee.

I was driven to despair by illness and willing to try most anything to obtain relief. Imagine my surprise when I made Postum Cereal Coffee according to directions and liked it as well as any coffee I ever drank.

So the problem was solved. I began to improve in health, could sleep well nights, my headaches disappeared, and I kept gaining in flesh, until I went from 118 pounds to 150, and I am now perfectly well and feel so. I have been able to do an enormous amount of extra work that would have been absolutely impossible under the old conditions.

Please do not use my name in public." Name can be given by Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

Our Budget.

—Congress assembles March 26.

—We mean, of course, the Congress of the Disciples at Lexington.

—This is an assembly for free thinking and free speaking on great topics. It will be as lively as a tariff debate in the House of Representatives and as clean and sweet-spirited as a prayer-meeting.

—At our conventions we prize harmony. At the Congress, the more differences of opinion the better. Brotherly love will prevail but criticism will be frank and there will be a free give and take of argument, without personalities.

—For many years we have needed such an escape valve as the Congress where those who have ideas can air them, and so keep them from spoiling. Ideas are like those high explosives which are harmless when exploded in open air but tear up the earth when they are confined.

—The third annual meeting of the eastern Iowa Ministerial Association will be held at Davenport the second week in April. The general character of the topics discussed will be sociological. Lodging and breakfast furnished free to those who send their names in advance to C. C. Davis, Sec'y., Davenport, Ia.

—The Christian Church at Monroe City, Mo., R. B. Briney, pastor, has just put in a new pipe organ, costing $500, built by the well-known St. Louis firm of organ builders, George Kilgen & Son. On Tuesday, March 12, an organ recital and concert was given by the choir of the Christian Church, Paris, Mo.

—J. P. McKnight completed the first year of his pastorate at Oskaloosa, March 3. The clerk, J. M. Stoke, reports that it is one of the best years in the history of the church. There have been 47 additions, $460 raised for missions (exclusive of C. W. B. M. and C. E.), $365 for church improvements and $2,400 for current expenses.

—A paper chronicles the fact that a certain church has been converted into an ice-house and adds, "it was found that very little alteration was necessary." This may have been meant literally, but we have seen some churches—some congregations, that is—in the midst of which ice would not melt in August. What they need is to get rid of their sawdust of time-honored formalism and let in the air and sunshine.

—A brother who is a good judge of sermons remarked in regard to one which he had heard, that it was only twelve minutes long, but even then was out of proportion; its extreme narrowness and thinness making about one minute the proper length. A congregation can stand a good deal of length if the sermon also has breadth and depth. We heard Dr. Lyman Abbott remark once that what people objected to is not long sermons, but elongated sermons.

—The Twentieth Century National Gospel Campaign, which was inaugurated several weeks ago under the direction of an executive committee, composed of leading men of many denominations, is making excellent progress. The movement has been inaugurated in about fifty leading centers. Twenty-two churches in Philadelphia have participated in it, with 916 conversions. Ottawa, Canada, is reported to have had a wonderful religious awakening under the leadership of William Phillips Hall. Thousands of personal letters are being sent out by the committee to ministers in all parts of the United States and vast quantities of campaign material are being distributed. The object of the movement is not only the winning of converts to the churches but the deepening of the spiritual life in the hearts of both ministers and laymen.

—We are requested to state that a first-class singer can be engaged for services in April, May and June, by addressing Hackleman Music Co., 712 Majestic Building, Indianapolis, Ind.

—Prof. John Joyce, singing evangelist, is open to engagements for evangelistic meetings. His services after April 15 can be secured by addressing him at Trimble, Ore. He furnishes song books for use in meetings.

—A delegation of the Christian Church at Fairfield, Ia., recently called without warning upon the pastor, Leander Lane, and his wife, and presented them with a china dinner set and several other things which our informant was kind enough not to specify.

—As one result of Mrs. Hazelrigg's meeting at Garnett, besides the forty additions reported last week, the congregation raised $700 for minister's salary for full time and called Bro. Ellis, of Iowa, who has accepted. The congregation expects to build an addition soon to its house.

—H. W. Graham, of Chicago, writes that J. S. Hughes gave his lecture on "The Seer of Patmos" at a union service of the Reformed, Methodist, Baptist and Christian Churches of Irving Park on March 3. The audience filled the largest available auditorium and received the lecture with great interest, though this is the third time that it has been given in this place.

—Eld. James C. T. Hall, of Albion, Ill., died on March 4, at the age of almost 84 years. He was born in England but was brought to this country in infancy and throughout his long life was prominent in all good works. He had been a member of the Christian Church for 63 years and a preacher for more than half a century. He passed away full of years and honored by all who knew him. Funeral services were conducted by Brother Caleb Edwards.

—Brother J. M. Van Horn, who has been pastor of the church at Warren, O., for eleven years, has resigned there to accept a call to the church at Worcester, Mass. He writes: "I have enjoyed my work here very much and I do not expect ever to find a church that will do more for me than this one would." Brother Van Horn seems to us to be just the man for the field to which he goes. He has had experience in the east and is fitted to work among eastern people. He was a success in Chester, England; he was a success at Warren, and he will be a success at Worcester.

—One of our not particularly esteemed contemporaries in advertising the bound volumes of itself modestly says: "They contain the best and wisest comments on current events in the world; they are a safe guide in Business and Politics; they contain the best thoughts about Art, Music, Literature and Science; they are an inspired Bible commentary and the safest and best works extant on Theology." We give the reader forty guesses to find the name of this encyclopedic and incomparable journal, and when he gives it up we will tell that it is John Alex. Dowie's "Leaves of Healing" Let any man bring forth even a patent medicine advertisement that can match this for comprehensive arrogance.

An Honest Tired Feeling

There is an "honest tired feeling," caused by necessary toil and cured by natural rest.

But very different is "that tired feeling," from which so many complain and which may even be classed as a disease.

That tired feeling takes you to bed tired and wakes you up tired.

You have no appetite, have bilious taste, dull headache, are nervous and irritable, blue, weak and discouraged.

In such conditions Hood's Sarsaparilla does a world of good.

It begins in the right place—in the blood, purifying it and imparting vitality, then its tonic effect is felt by the stomach, kidneys and liver; appetite comes back, all waste is removed naturally, headaches cease, that tired feeling departs and you feel like a new person.

This has been the experience of thousands.

It will be yours if you take —Marion Stevenson, of Decatur, Ill., has been called to the church at Irving Park and will begin work on April 1.

—John Young has resigned the work at Everett, Wash., after two years' ministry and can be addressed at that point in regard to future engagements.

—F. W. Burnham has closed a five years' pastorate at Charleston, Ill., and has accepted a call to the Edward Street Church at Decatur, Ill., which is vacated by Marion Stevenson.

—A local paper of Pittsfield, Ill., has a picture and sketch of Russell F. Thrapp, pastor of the Christian Church there. Brother Thrapp holds a high place in the regard of his fellow-townsmen.

—It is reported that, through the influence of the Christian Endeavorers in Michigan, beginning with a petition from the society at Milford, the passenger agents of all the Michigan railroads have agreed to do away with Sunday excursions this year.

—Dr. W. T. Moore spent two days in St. Louis last week en route to Terre Haute, Ind., where he will give a series of lecture sermons continuing until the Lexington Congress.

—C. L. Frederick, the father of Mrs. W. T. Moore, died on Feb. 28, at his home in Carthage, N. Y. He was widely known and much honored among the Disciples in the east.

—The work of the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses during April, May and June will be devoted to the study of missions and it is suggested that all pastors organize special classes for this three months' campaign of education. For full particulars address J. Z. Tyler, 798 Republic Street, Cleveland, O.

—Sherman B. Moore, who recently resigned at Compton Heights, St. Louis, will begin his work at Atlanta the fifth Sunday in March. His family will visit relatives and friends in Memphis, Tenn., and will join him at Atlanta later. The Compton Heights Church has no announcement to make yet in regard to the filling of its pastorate.

—It may not be generally known by our readers that Gov. Odell, of New York, is a graduate of Bethany College. At a recent dinner given to him by his brethren of the Beta Theta Pi fraternity in the Waldorf-Astoria, New York, the place of honor on the program was given to Bethany College, which was represented by P. D. Cochran, of Uniontown, Pa.

—We are in receipt of a postal card without date or address in which a brother informs us that he "began a meeting here Tuesday night. Good prospects." As the postmark is indecipherable, we are willing to turn over to any Sherlock Holmes among our readers the task of determining from the color of the ink and the style of the writing what place is meant by "here."

—The Young Men's Christian Associations of North America will hold their jubilee convention in Boston, June 11-16. The first Y. M. C. A. was organized in London, 1844, the first in North America in Montreal, November, 1851; the first in the United States in Boston, December, 1851. President McKinley and Lord Strathcona, Lord High Commissioner of Canada, have promised to be present.

—A church of forty members was organized last week at Bogard, Mo., by R. H. Love at the close of a three weeks' meeting. This congregation was born of missionary effort and its organizer says it is a missionary church. A house of worship will be built in the autumn. The church is composed of some of the best men and women in Carroll county. Brother Love has been engaged to hold another meeting there in September. Meanwhile he can be engaged for meetings anywhere. Address him at Columbia, Mo.

—H. L. Willett has just closed his second lecture course with the church at Springfield, Ill. J. E. Lynn, the pastor, writes: "He was received with even greater enthusiasm than before. A crowded house greeted him the opening night, representing the best people from all the churches of the city, and continued to come to the close. We regard it as one of the best things which our church has done in the way of bringing Christian people together in the spirit of unity to search for the true teaching of the Scripture."

—The University of Oregon, located at Eugene, Ore., will employ additional instructors as follows for the year beginning October 1, 1901: Assistant Professor of English, $1,500; Instructor in Mathematics, $1,000; Instructor in Latin and French or German, $1,000; Instructor in Mechanical and Electrical Engineering, $1,200; Assistant Professor of Education to act as University Examiner and Inspector of High Schools, $1,200; Assistant Instructor in Economics, $500. As our Eugene Divinity School is located here it would be well if some of our members secured positions in this list. Dr. Frank Strong, president of the University, will nominate men for these positions probably in June.

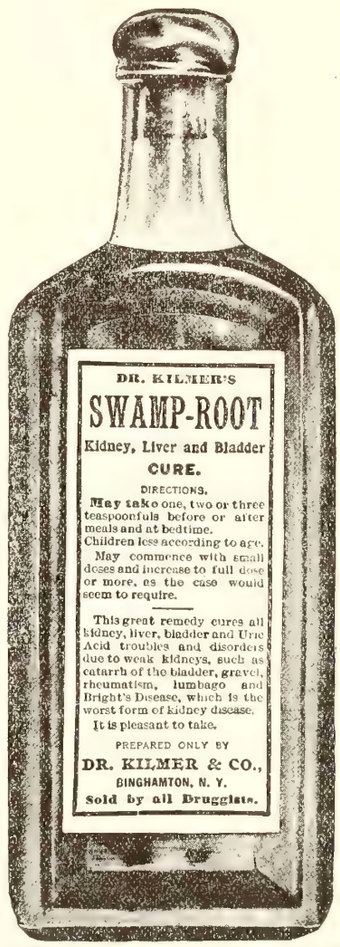
Are Your Kidneys Weak?

Thousands Have Kidney Trouble and Never Suspect It.

To Prove what the Great Kidney Remedy, SWAMP-ROOT, Will Do for YOU, all our Readers May Have a Sample Bottle Sent Absolutely Free by Mail.

Most people do not realize the alarming prevalency of kidney disease. While kidney disorders are the most common diseases that prevail, they are almost the last recognized by patient and physician, who content themselves with doctoring the effects, while the original disease constantly undermines the system.

It used to be considered that only urinary and bladder troubles were to be traced to the kidneys, but now modern science proves that nearly all diseases have their beginning in the disorder of these most important organs.



If you are sick or "feel badly," begin taking the famous new discovery, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, because as soon as your kidneys are well they will help all the other organs to health. A trial will convince anyone.

Weak and unhealthy kidneys are responsible for more sickness and suffering than any other disease, and if permitted to continue fatal results are sure to follow. Kidney trouble irritates the nerves, makes you dizzy, restless, sleepless and irritable. Makes you pass water often during the day, and obliges you to get up many times during the night. Causes puffy or dark circles under the eyes, rheumatism, gravel, catarrh of the bladder, pain or dull ache in the back, joints or muscles, makes your head ache and back ache, causes indigestion, stomach and liver trouble; you get a sallow, yellow complexion; makes you feel as though you had heart trouble; you may have plenty of ambition, but no strength; get weak and waste away.

The cure for these troubles is Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the world-famous kidney remedy. In taking Swamp-Root you afford natural help to Nature, for Swamp-Root is the most perfect healer and gentle aid to the kidneys.

If there is any doubt in your mind as to your condition, take from your urine on rising about four ounces, place it in a glass or bottle and let it stand twenty-four hours. If on examination it is milky or cloudy, if there is a brick-dust settling, or if small particles float about in it, your kidneys are in need of immediate attention.

Swamp-Root is pleasant to take and is used in the leading hospitals, recommended by physicians in their private practice, and is taken by doctors themselves who have kidney ailments, because they recognize in it the greatest and most successful remedy for kidney, liver and bladder troubles.

(Swamp-Root is pleasant to take.)

If you are already convinced that Swamp-Root is what you need, you can purchase the regular fifty-cent and one-dollar size bottles at the drug stores everywhere.

SPECIAL NOTICE. Swamp-Root, the great kidney, liver and bladder remedy, is so remarkably successful that a special arrangement has been made by which all CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST readers who have not already tried it may have a sample bottle sent absolutely free by mail. Also a book telling all about kidney and bladder troubles and containing many of the thousands upon thousands of testimonial letters received from men and women cured by Swamp-Root. In writing, be sure and mention reading this generous offer in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, St. Louis, when sending your address to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y.

—T. F. Odenweller writes the following appeal in behalf of a brother who is widely and favorably known:

J. A. Seaton has met a number of reverses in years gone by. Now another great misfortune has overtaken him and he is left almost penniless. On March 5th, the parsonage at Spencer, Iowa, caught fire and is almost a total loss and all of Bro. Seaton's library and household goods were consumed. I have known this family for nearly thirty years. They are worthy. His pocketbook has been open to every needy person and noble cause. His labors, both evangelistic and pastoral, have been abundant and fruitful. Many owe their life in Christ to his efficient labor. Will not these and others, out of their abundance, contribute for the relief of this worthy family? Send suitable books. The preacher needs them. They are his tools. Our preachers know what the loss of the library means and the housekeeper knows what it is to lose all belongings of the home. Does brotherly love abound? Certainly our brother's misfortune will stir the fountain of Christian liberality. It is pleasant to know that fifty homes, including hotels at Spencer, are open to Bro. Seaton and family. Others elsewhere should have a part in this tender ministry.

—The Foreign Missionary Society reports a dangerous loss in receipts for the week ending March 14 as compared with the same week last year. The number of contributing churches for the week has fallen from 435 to 313 and the amount from $13,087.62 to $10,275.44. This is all wrong. We will never reach the $200,000 mark at this rate, but we must reach it. Many a defeat in the first skirmish has been the forerunner of victory. Let every church which has a particle of interest send in its contribution at once to F. M. Rains, Y. M. C. A. Building, Cincinnati, O.

—St. Louis, Mo., March 18. The following reports were made at the St. Louis ministers' meeting: First Church, T. P. Haley, meeting closed (see below). Second Church, five additions yesterday. Compton Heights, three additions. Mount Cabanne, two additions; meeting continues. F. G. Tyrrell spoke yesterday afternoon at the Central Y. M. C. A. J. B. Briney will deliver three lectures at Mount Cabanne Church this week. Pres. D. R. Dungan, of Christian University, Canton, Mo., was present at the ministers' meeting and spoke briefly on the educational situation in Missouri. The paper of the morning was by James McAllister, pastor of the Central Church on "The Church of To-day, its Strength and Weakness."

W. E. G.

—St. Louis, Mo., March 18. The special meetings that have been going on in the First Christian Church in this city for two weeks, in which T. P. Haley, of Kansas City, Mo., has been aiding the pastor, closed last night. The purpose of the meeting was not so much to gain additions to this congregation, as there is a phenomenal growth in this church in this direction, but rather to build up the membership in the knowledge of the word and the development of Christian character.

It was the current remark of those who heard Dr. Haley in this meeting and that sat under his ministry 20 years ago when he was pastor of this church, which then worshiped at 17th and Olive, that he had grown as a preacher. Each sermon was introduced by a prelude on "Happy Homes and How to Make Them."

The weather was greatly against a large attendance. But on nights favorable the building was taxed to its utmost capacity. All in the First feel that Bro. Haley's work has done a great and lasting good. There were 10 confessions and two by letter.

F. O. FANNON, pastor.

—As an exception to our usual rule not to publish accounts of meetings in addition to a brief report of the results, we cannot refrain from inserting an extract from a letter from I. J. Cahill, pastor of the Christian Church at Dayton, O., where the Wilson and Huston meeting was recently held with wonderful results. Brother Cahill is a vigorous and up-to-date pastor who will take good care of the almost 500 converts who have been added to his church.

The Dayton, Ohio, meeting closed February 25, with a packed house and a total of 493 additions. Thirty-two were added the last Sunday. The whole city of 90,000 people was stirred as it never had been before. The house was thronged night after night by an eager multitude. Bibles were studied constantly and earnestly. Christians who had been for years members of denominational churches came to the meetings regularly and enthusiastically expressed their enjoyment of them. A common expression from such was "We learn so much here." Many of these not only heard, but believed and obeyed. A number of Catholics were converted. The largest number of additions on a single day was 52; in a single service 25; the largest number at a midweek service was 23. Many cases of household conversions occurred, including one whole family of seven members.

Evangelist Allen Wilson is a master workman in the winning of souls. That is the one thing which he does. His preaching is of high quality. He is earnest, convincing, attractive and magnetic. Among his most effective qualities are his ability to teach plainly and strongly the fundamental truths of the Bible and his urgent appeals. His skill in personal work is unusual and herein is one secret of his success.

Prof. Huston is an able co-worker. He has a just conception of the spiritual nature of his work and subordinates technique to spiritual power both in his chorus work and in his solos. His work in preparing an audience for the sermon is peculiarly effective and he is also a good personal worker.

The meeting is a historic one. It has attracted attention far and wide. Only one other meeting in the history of the brotherhood has exceeded the number of additions in this one. Its success did not puff up with pride the evangelists, but rather humbled them. The church worked earnestly and faithfully and gave loyal support to the evangelists in their work from first to last.

Thorough preparation had been made for their coming. The church was harmonious, earnest and expectant, but no one anticipated so wonderful a victory as crowned their labors. The congregation now numbers more than 1,000. The pastor will have a helper and it is expected soon to organize a second church.

—The Christian Publishing Company is planning to issue, in the near future, a high grade church hymnal. It is the purpose and desire of the publishers to produce a book that will compare favorably with the best books prepared for and used by the leading religious bodies in this country, and that will be of a higher type than any book now in use among us. The editor of this book will be glad to receive, from any source, hints and suggestions as to selections, arrangement, etc., lists of tunes or poems which may be thought appropriate for the work. As this is to be a book for the regular Sunday services of the church, all light, frothy music, such as has flooded the country for the past few years, will be excluded in favor of the grand chorals which will always endure. If you have any ideas about the preparation of such a book, address them to "Musical Editor," Christian Publishing Co., St. Louis, Mo.

The Coming Congress.

The people of Lexington, Ky., are looking with pleasing anticipations to the coming Congress of Disciples to be held here beginning on Tuesday afternoon, March 26, and closing with the Thursday night session, March 28.

The sessions will be held in the auditorium of Central Christian Church, corner Short and Walnut streets, just a few steps north of the post office.

The church is within easy walking distance of all the railroad depots but the Southern, and those arriving at the Southern (same as Queen & Cresent) can take the East Main St. cars to the post office and from there walk up Walnut to the church building. On and after Tuesday morning the committee on entertainment or assignment of homes will be at Central Church ready to welcome the coming guests and to assign them to homes during the Congress. Lodging and breakfast will be provided without cost. Dinner and supper will be furnished near the church at 25 cents each. This plan of entertainment was adopted at Indianapolis last year and was recommended by the committee on program and general arrangements.

Be sure to write immediately to Mr. Mark Collis, Fayette Park, Lexington, Ky., if you expect to attend the Congress and mention the probable time of your arrival.

It will be no doubt an interesting, instructive and memorable gathering. May the blessing of God be upon it from first to last.

Cincinnati Letter.

On a Common Platform.

We have recently been enjoying a rich intellectual and spiritual feast. Dr. Herbert L. Willett, of Chicago, has just closed a series of lectures on the "Life of Christ." He came under the joint auspices of the city C. E. Union and the Y. M. C. A. and addressed large audiences on this most inspiring of all themes. Such work will tell mightly for our well beloved cause of Christian union. People of all creeds sit together and with no thought but of those things in which we all agree. It is refreshing to see the good feeling spontaneously showing forth when we unite for some such cause as that of studying the life and teachings of our Lord. Here our creeds are practically one. Here is the center of all faith. It is in the circumference of opinion we differ. A little more emphasis at this point, with less on many minor things, would greatly enhance our movement toward union.

A Missionary Heroine.

Our churches have also been enjoying another blessed privilege. Mrs Dr. Rijnhart has just completed a series of engagements in which she has told something of her wonderful experiences in the strange, wild land of Thibet. Hers is a story full of the most fascinating interest. She was among a strange, almost unknown people and her experiences sound like a repetition of the pioneer missionary history in days long gone by. Indeed it was such. With her husband, she penetrated a region unknown to whites, among a nomadic, barbarian people. The end of it was that Mr. Rijnhart lost his life by treacherous hands and this frail woman was left to find her way out through several hundred miles of perilous country alone. The story of that escape surpasses the drama and tragedy of mere fancy. There were two months of this most awful hardship. If ever providence lends a helping hand it was illustrated here. I will not attempt to tell aught of the thrilling story for Dr. Rijnhart's book is soon to be issued and all may read this chronicle of missionary zeal and heroism for themselves. Notwithstanding all the past this sweet-spirited, devoted woman has but one desire and that is to return to the same people and tell the story of the cross.

The Ministers Win.

Of course all have read something of our recent prize-fight fight. It was a victory for civic and social righteousness, but it was more. It was a demonstration of the fact that when a body of Christian ministers unitedly and resolutely set their faces toward a victory for clean social life they can accomplish it. The whole program was outlined and executed in the Evangelical Alliance. The attorneys took it up through the agitation and persuasion of these men. It is pre-eminently our victory. The ministry of the city entered upon a campaign of action rather than the usual one of talk alone. The judge said in giving his decision that "the purpose of a body of ministers of the gospel in regard to such a great moral question as this could not be impugned." There is yet much that might be done in this city and the same determined efforts would do it, but we must be content with even so much, it seems.

Among the Churches.

Revivals have been at a discount among us this winter, but there has been a large number of accessions to the churches. Chas. Darsie of the First Church, Newport, held his own meeting and received more than thirty confessions. Harry G. Hill, of North Side, was assisted by J. H. Hughes, of California, with about the same results. Bro. Hill has had more than 100 accessions in the two years of his ministry there. Next winter we are to have a great all-city campaign with Scoville as captain. With a year to prepare we should do great things. The total missionary offerings for the first Sunday in March amounted to fifteen hundred dollars—not a large amount certainly for more than four thousand Disciples. The Central becomes a "Living-Link Church." The first week in April F. B. Meyer, of London, is to be with us in a short series of evangelical meetings.

A. W. TAYLOR.

Texas Letter.

At the Paris convention last year it was decided to have our next convention at Galveston, but the great flood made it necessary to seek another location. Several places urgently asked for it, and the State Board has just decided to give it to Waco. The time—June 20-24—remains the same. This time includes a Lord's day, which is unusual in a Texas convention.

Philip F. King, of Corsicana, has determined to return to Kentucky, the place of his birth. We regret losing him from Texas, but heartily commend him to the Kentucky churches.

J. W. Holsapple, our Sherman pastor, is to have J. V. Updike to assist him in a meeting in May. Bro. Updike is not a stranger to our Texas people, and they will welcome him again to our state.

J. A. Shoptaugh has been called to the pastorate of the new church in Cleburne. He is recently from Kansas, and we rejoice to have him locate in our midst.

J. S. Myers, after a long absence in Philadelphia, by the sick bed of his wife, has returned to his work with the Tabernacle church of Ft. Worth. This vigorous young church observed its first anniversary on the third Sunday of February.

Granville Jones and R. E. Grabel will soon enter the field as temperance evangelists. They will make a strong combination, and we hope the experiment may be successful.

The Baptists of Texas are strong and aggressive. Just now they are giving special emphasis to school work, and their work is telling in that worthy cause. They have six schools, 75 acres of city and town property, 22 buildings, well equipped, 22,200 volumes in libraries, large amount of apparatus and museum specimens, etc. Total value of property $535,000; teachers 105, students 1,895. This is truly a fine showing, and it should stimulate our people to a greater work in the interest of schools.

W. H. Williams, for years our missionary at Jamaica, is in our midst, and I believe he could be induced to locate with us. Let some chuch needing a pastor put him to work.

That our city is growing rapidly is evident from a statement just published by Postmaster O'Leary, comparing the receipts of his office for the years 1890 and 1900. Ten years ago the amount was $100,068.24, and in 1900 it was $196,842.57, an increase of almost 100 per cent. A little pride on the part of the average Dallasite, under the circumstances, surely ought to be pardonable.

The Courier has bought the book and Sunday-school business of R. E. Grabel, and will push it in this territory. It has also absorbed The Visitor, the sprightly monthly conpucted by J. W. Holsapple, of Sherman. We hail with pleasure these evidences of enterprise and prosperity.

Albert Buxton leaves Hillsboro for Norfolk, Va, and thus Texas loses one of her strong men. But I must not begrudge the "Old Dominion," my birthplace, this good fortune.

A snow is an unusual thing in this sunny land; but February 22, as if fearful it would not impress itself upon us, not only brought the 169th anniversary of the birth of the good and great Washington, but it brought a four-inch snow, which is a blessing to the farmer and fruit grower. It is the best thing possible for the wheat, and it makes more sure the fruit by keeping the buds back and saving them from Jack Frost.

Eat and Run.

There isn't a man who would be seen running through the street munching a piece of pie. Why not? Because it would mean dyspepsia and stomach trouble? Not at all; but because it wouldn't look well. As a matter of fact many a business man snatches a lunch in such a hurry that he might as well take it on the run. That is one reason for the prevailing "stomach trouble" among men of business.

There is a certain remedy for diseases of the stomach and other organs of digestion and nutrition. It is Doctor Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. The worst cases of dyspepsia and catarrh of the stomach have been cured by this medicine. It cures where all other means have failed to cure.

"I took two bottles of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery for stomach trouble," writes Clarence Carnes, Esq., of Taylorstown, Loudoun Co., Va. "It did me so much good that I didn't take any more. I can eat most anything now. I am so well pleased with it I hardly know how to thank you for your kind information. I tried a whole lot of things before I wrote to you. There was a gentleman told me about your medicine, and how it had cured his wife. I thought I would try a bottle of it. Am now glad I did, for I don't know what I would have done if it had not been for Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery."

Doctor Pierce's Pleasant Pellets cure biliousness. They stimulate the sluggish liver, and cleanse the system of impurities. They should always be used with "Golden Medical Discovery" when there is need of a laxative.

The Educational Convention.

The national convention of our churches in Kansas City, Mo., in October last, appointed a committee, consisting of W. F. Richardson, George Darsie, F. W. Drake, J. H. Garrison, A. B. Philputt, J. A. Lord and F. D. Power, "to formulate a plan of organization for an Educational Society among the Disciples of Christ," and authorized this committee to call a special convention for that purpose either in connection with the next annual convention of the A. C. M. S. or with the annual Congress of Disciples in 1901.

The committee hereby announce such meeting for Morrison Chapel, Kentucky University, Lexington, during the Congress, March 26-28, at an hour to be announced later.

F. D. POWER, Chairman.

The Church of Christ in Sevas lost one of her most faithful and pious sisters on the 2nd of January, leaving a true Christian husband and five infant children to mourn her loss. She was loved and admired by every one who knew her, so that the whole church deeply felt her loss. But he who said, "I will not leave you comfortless," most faithfully fulfilled his promise, and on last Lord's day added to his church five precious souls. One of these is a young man 17 years old, and another a young lady 14 years old, whose fathers were among the first 19 believers at the organization of the church in August, 1883, and by their fidelity and zeal were pillars in the church up to the time they suffered martyrdom with their other brother, five years ago. The other three is a family group of a father, carpenter by trade, his wife and grown son, members of the old Armenian church. We had been making some alterations in the pulpit platform under which we had a suitable baptistry built. The work was completed late Saturday evening, and on the following day in the presence of a crowded house their baptisms took place, the crowd keeping perfect order up to the last. There is great rejoicing among the brethren and sisters, as they feel greatly encouraged. I am not in the habit of mentioning "inquirers" who are many, but this I know, that there is a great stir among the people, and much searching of the Scriptures which cannot fail to spread the light of the word among the people who are lovers of the truth as it is in Christ Jesus.

Yours in hope,

G. N. SHISHMANIAN.

Ohio Letter.

M. E. Chatley, recently of Carnegie, Pa., has accepted a call to the Fourth Ave. Church in Columbus, and is already "at it." The church seems to be very happy over its selection and the prospects for a good work there are very bright. The Fourth Ave. Church is one of the best working churches in Ohio. They have the best Endeavor Society in the Columbus union.

The church building at Hamilton has been enlarged and improved and was reopened last Lord's day. G. O. Black ministers to this people. The venerable L. L. Carpenter preached the sermons last Sunday.

I. J. Cahill, of Dayton, gave his lecture on "Peter's Wife's Mother," at Mt. Healthy and East Liberty recently, to the delight of the people. Bro. Cahill says he is an expert on the question of the mother-in-law. He has one of his own, and often makes them two at a time.

E. S. DeMiller is assisting C. M. Oliphant in a meeting at Wheeling, W. Va., this month. His last meeting was at Guelph, Ontario.

All Buckeye churches that have not taken the offering for Foreign Missions have plenty of time yet to redeem themselves before the month is gone. Religion is peculiar in that the more we give away the more we have at home, and when we don't give any away it is a sign of very little at home.

M. L. Bates, of Newark, gave a lecture before the students of Hiram March 12 on "The Ministry as a Profession."

J. T. Bridwell, of St. Thomas, Ont., will preach for the church at McArthur for six months, beginning April 1. He teaches language in the school of the Disciples at St. Thomas.

Wilson and Huston are storming Steubenville at this time. Good results are reported so far. In the great Dayton meeting from 150 to 175 came from the denominations; seven came from the Catholics.

E. J. Meacham is doing a good work with the church at Wilmington. He came to us from Tennessee last fall. In a recent meeting about 30 were baptized.

Secretary Bartlett says the work at Chillicothe has taken on new life and is more hopeful than it has ever been. The patient sowing in tears of the past years is bearing fruit.

Quite a few Buckeye preachers will attend the congress at Lexington next week. This will be a great privilege. We are sorry to miss it, but a meeting at home is in progress. J. Walter Wilson is giving us fine service in song. The meeting is four days old and six have responded to the invitation.

M. L. Buckley will leave Rushsylvania and locate with the church at Harrison April 1. We congratulate him and the church. The people of Harrison are marvels of patience. They listened to this scribe preach for near three years.

The springtime draweth near. Now is the time for all good men to come to the aid of the party and elect a good mayor and council. It is a good time to let your light shine. If you want to bury Carrie Nation's hatchet vote for the men who are out and out against the saloon.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

Kingsville is one of the country schools that follows the newer plans in the work, and Miss Lulu Fryer is one of the happiest leaders in the state. The rally was most successful simply because she and J. W. Boulton put it into their hearts to make it so.

Archie is now one of the flourishing schools of the state, all due to the pushing energy of Prof. Campbell, while Andrew Scott is urging more and more the older people to fellowship the school work. At Everett we have school every Lord's day in the year, though it is in a country district, and yet, men like Brethren Davis and Frazier will not permit it to lag if the roads are somewhat against them.

All the friends of Bible-school work in Missouri will rejoice to know that C. B. Lotspeich is again at the helm in Butler, for he is one of the first friends to this feature of the work.

Think of a church with a $13,000 debt, then think of the school being just as true to missions as if there were no debts, and that will describe Nevada, for in all its burdens they have never been slack in their hearty support of this cause.

R. R. Coffey is trying to bring Rich Hill to the front and all who know the congregation wish him success. He joins our volunteer army and wants both his schools in our cooperation.

Let all our county Bible-school superintendents plan for good work this spring and if you want help from this office command us.

Berea (Vernon) is another one of the country schools that is running winter and summer, and my day with them was in midwinter, but it did not matter with J. Q. Thompson or the Comptons, and it was one of the happiest days this year, for with all my work they were in full sympathy and to our work were most liberal. A. Sterling, our Johnson county superintendent, is their minister and had led them this way.

Windsor has a member that in the last twenty years has missed only five times, and our Brother A. L. Clinkenbeard may well be proud of it. He and Dr. Shivell are ever ready in their co-operation with us.

Some one asks who has the longest service in Missouri as Bible-school superintendent, and my answer is, F. H. Miller, Appleton City, who is now in his twenty-fourth year. Do you know of one having served longer? In all this time the school has co-operated with us too.

Osceola has improved under the leadership of King Starke until old time friends would not know the church and school, but the faces of John Ragland and wife are always to be seen. M. F. Butler is now the superintendent, and many know what that means for the school.

Brownington has changed superintendents as well as ministers this year, but only for change's sake. The school will aim to push the teaching method more than ever before and W. W. Warren will do all possible to help them. Here, too, under Sister Rogers the girls and boys are working for a souvenir and will get it.

We are getting ready for the Sedalia Convention and will soon send the program to press. Are you getting ready for it? Will you lend a hand by seeing that the school sends in its apportionment so we can clear up the books by May 31?

Congress of the Disciples.

The brethren in Lexington, Ky., will gladly welcome and entertain those attending the Congress of Disciples to be held March 26-28 in Central Christian Church, corner of Walnut and Short Streets, a few steps north of the postoffice.

All who expect to attend are urgently requested to write immediately to Bro. Mark Collis, Fayette Park, Lexington, Ky., so that upon their arrival at Central Church they may be assigned to homes where they will be provided with lodging and breakfast free.

Dinner and supper will be served near the church at 25 cents each. This plan of entertainment was observed last year at Indianapolis and was recommended by the committee on program and general arrangements. Do not fail to write Bro. Collis that you are coming, and come.

I. J. SPENCER.

Chairman Local Committee.

As will be seen in a notice in "Subscribers' Wants," we have instituted an additional plan of assistance to our patrons. Mr. A. O. Garrison, of the Christian Pub. Co., a well-known organist and musician, will lend his services, free of charge, in assisting any church, or any of our patrons, in the purchase of an organ or piano. Neither he nor this company has any instruments for sale, but, acting as the agent of the purchaser, Mr. Garrison will select an instrument for any who wish to save the expense of a trip to the city, or who do not feel themselves capable of choosing a good instrument. He is generally able, moreover, to secure an instrument at a lower price than that quoted to the ordinary purchaser, and will gladly assist any church or individual in the purchase of a $25 reed organ or a $10,000 pipe organ.

The Topical Hand-Book for 1901 contains an analysis of each of the 52 Sunday-school lessons of the year, with the Golden Texts, Persons, Places and Leading Thought; the outlines of the Midweek Church Prayer-Meeting, with copious Scripture references; an analysis of each of the Y. P. S. C. E. Topics, with carefully selected Daily Readings, and Helpful Outlines of the Junior Topics. So much valuable material is rarely found in a single book. Price, 50 cents per dozen; or $3.00 per hundred. Christian Publishing Co., St. Louis.

Illinois Notes.

Reports of meetings: H. G. Bennett, Elkville, 16 additions; J. H. Smart, Winchester, 44 conversions; W. D. Deweese, Bloomington mission, 38 additions; J. H. Gilliland, Danville, 123 additions; J. Fred Jones, Potomac, 13 conversions and three others; Simpson Ely, Roodhouse, 23 conversions and 21 others. The last two meetings were under the direction of our board.

J. J. Harris, our evangelist, closed a great meeting at Carterville with 72 additions, and is now at work at Brooklyn.

The secretary will spend the month of April under the direction and pay of the American Christian Missionary Society.

Our district conventions are held in May and June. Let them be worthy of the great interests they represent.

With the beginning of the next missionary year our board will have an office secretary and a state paper. The man is selected and will be announced in due time.

County Co-operative Meeting.

There is to be a co-operative meeting of the Churches of Christ in Carter co., Ky. beginning April 12 and continuing over Lord's day. It is very important that the churches be fully represented.

A good programme will be arranged.

Steps will be taken to hold a protracted meeting with each church, and at each mission point this spring and summer.

Steps must be taken to support an evangelist in the county. This is just now the work of the convention.

Bro. R. B. Neal has been holding up this work almost single-handed. He has been compelled to go outside of the county for a support a large part of the time.

The young churches at Willard, Olive Hill, Soldier, and Falls Branch and the older ones at Iron Hill, Corinth, Mannin, Trough Camp, Sutton, Oak Grove and Reeder demand his attention.

Also such points as Clifty, Rush, Carter City, Wilson and Stafford Hill are ripe for the harvest. Truly the harvest is great and the laborers are few. Brethren, do not fail, be on hand, help push the work.

Fat Travelers.

Live On Grape-Nuts.

When one looks at commercial travelers, round, smooth, and well kept, it is hard to believe that any of them have to be particular about the selection of food, but many of them do nevertheless, and their care in this respect is one cause of their healthy appearance.

Frank W. Clarke, who travels for Arbuckle Bros, says that he began using Grape-Nuts Food when he found it on the hotel menu, and ever since that time has eaten Grape Nuts from one to three times a day, carrying a package in his grip, so he could have it whenever the hotels did not serve it.

He says: "About eight years ago dyspepsia got hold of me and gradually weakened my stomach so that it would not take all kinds of food. I had to drop a number of articles which is a hard thing for a traveling man to do. Then the question was 'what could I get to eat that would not distress me?' When I found Grape-Nuts Food it solved the problem, and since taking on this food my stomach has gradually gotten well so that I feel in fine shape."

"The proof of the pudding is in the eating." Grape-Nuts is pre-digested in its manufacture, and can be easily assimilated by the weakest kind of a stomach, while at the same time it contains the most powerful elements of nourishment, strong in the elements of phosphate of potash, which, united with albumen, go to make the gray matter in the nerve cells and brain. People that are not properly nourished can solve the problem by using Grape-Nuts Food.

Concerning the Communion.

Did the New Testament Church observe it on any other day than the first day of the week? If so, it is within the limits of Christian liberty to do so now.

The question is not, did the New Testament churches usually observe the communion on each first day of the week? This is an undisputed fact, the record being more explicit in the latter days of the New Testament. The question is not by whom, when, nor how it was instituted, nor for what purpose.

It is observed that "it is the almost universal testimony of Bible scholars and commentators that the church at Jerusalem observed the breaking of bread in the Eucharist or Lord's Supper daily." Allow me to ask, on what does this their "almost universal testimony" rest? On the statements of authentic history? If so, what history? Or is it a question of exegesis? If so, of what passages?

Of Acts 2:42? It reads: "And they continued stedfastly in the apostles' teaching and fellowship, in the breaking of bread and the prayers." There is nothing here to show how many times a week, or on what day, it was observed by them.

But perhaps it is found in Acts 2:46, 47, "And day by day, continuing stedfastly with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread at home, they did take their food with gladness and singleness of heart. Here we have "day by day"—or daily—but no reference to the observance of the communion. I am curious to know on what evidence "the almost universal testimony of Bible scholars" is based.

But says one: "The church at Troas on one occasion observed the Lord's Supper on Monday morning." If so, then we may do so under like circumstances. That is, if some preacher should meet with a church on the first day of the week, in the evening, "to break bread"; and if the preacher's sermon should happen to be so long and so intensely interesting as to hold the attention of the brethren spell-bound (not realizing the flight of time) till after midnight, before the communion, we might be able to claim apostolic precedent for observing the Supper just after midnight Sunday night, and might proceed to do so. But what license would such an extraordinary circumstance give for meeting upon some other day than the first day "to break bread"?

Justin Martyr tells us in A. D. 150: "On the day which is called Sunday, all, whether dwelling in the towns or in the villages, hold meetings." Then he tells what took place at those meetings, mentioning the observance of the Lord's Supper in detail. Murdock's Mosheim, Vol. I, p. 135.

I should be pleased to know what becomes of the consistency of those who plead for the restoration of apostolic Christianity, when they meet in convention on some week day (other than Sunday) to celebrate the Lord's Supper? M. INGELS.

Leanna, Kan.

[We beg to call attention to four points in regard to the above letter:

1. Observe the unqualified statement in the first paragraph, that if the New Testament church observed the communion on any other day than the first day of the week, it is within the limits of Christian liberty to do so now. Let this stand as a major premise. The minor premise is the admission that the church at Troas observed it on Monday. The conclusion is obvious. The act of the church at Troas showed that under certain circumstances it was considered proper to have the communion on other than the first day of the week. It certainly does not show that the prolongation of a service until after midnight is the only possible reason for making an exception to the usual practice.

2. Acts 2:46 is interpreted by the "almost universal testimony of Bible scholars" as referring to the communion. Observe the contrast between what the disciples did "in the temple" and what they did "at home" or "from house to house." They had no church building and could not observe the communion in the temple, so this distinctively Christian observance would naturally and inevitably take place in their own homes.

3. The testimony of Justin Martyr to the usage in the second century is irrelevant, for the discussion has to do with the New Testament churches. It is not disputed that weekly communion was customary after the first few years at Jerusalem.

4. Is it, as our correspondent says, a matter of no consequence for this discussion to consider "for what purpose" the ordinance was instituted? It seems to us of prime importance. If we know for what purpose our Lord instituted the Supper, we can know whether we are accomplishing that purpose and so meeting his wishes. It can scarcely be maintained that any time or manner of observance is illegitimate which fulfills our Lord's purpose.—EDITOR.]

Centralia, Ill., Mar. 15.—Meeting here two weeks' old; good interest and large attendance. Paul H. Castle is a noble young pastor. Received a proposition to go to Virginia May 1, as evangelist, but think I cannot accept.—BEN F. HILL & GUY B. WILLIAMSON.

Decatur, Ill., Mar. 18.—We have had 9 more additions at the tabernacle, seven by letter and two by confession. Have had additions every Sunday for 14 weeks. I have 72 in my Sunday school class. The Ladies' Aid raised $1,280 last year. Our membership is now over 800.—J. C. COGGINS.

Danville, Ill., Mar. 5.—We closed the best meeting the First Church has had since I have known it. Bro. J. H. Gilliland, of Bloomington, Ill., did the preaching. He is entirely free from objectionable methods of any kind. He appeals to the intelligence as well as to the heart. Results: 123 added, mostly by conversion. So far as can be seen old troubles are wiped out and members are united and joyous. There are many interested who did not obey the gospel, but we look for them in the near future. This makes 76 additions to this church since we took the work six months ago.—J. H. SMART.

Kellar, of Carrollton, Mo., assisted by the pastor, W. M. Featherston. The singing was in charge of Bro. Thos. W. Shepherd, of Carrollton, Mo., a splendid leader and soloist. The church has been greatly blessed and strengthened, and our people are better understood.—JACOB KNAPPENBERGER, clerk.

Kirksville, Mo., Mar. 12.—There were 13 additions to the church here Sunday night and six Monday night.—H. A. NORTHCUTT.

Poplar Bluff, Mo.—Meeting here with pastor J. T. Craig opens with 4 additions. The church is ready for a meeting. We put in a piano yesterday for use in meeting and ordered some new slides for stereopticon. Our large chorus of singers is doing splendid work. I can engage for April. Address L. B. 115.—C. M. HUGHES, gospel singer.

Richmond, Mo., Mar. 13.—H. A. Denton, of Warrensburg, assisted us in an 18 days' meeting in January, which, despite two membership funerals and an epidemic of the grippe, was well attended and successful. The preaching was all that could be desired and the church was greatly strengthened. There were 15 additions to the membership, 12 by primary obedience, two by statement and one by letter. The writer found pleasure in supplying at Warrensburg during Brother Denton's sojourn here. Have just finished raising $1,200 which clears our home from debt. Last week we gave Brother Dillard $30 for the Orphans' Home.—C. P. SMITH.

Rockport, Mo., Mar. 12.—Opened a meeting here last night. One confession first service. Bro. Rowe, the pastor, is a good brother and has everything well in hand.—A. R. HUNT.

Salem, Mo., Mar. 8.—We closed a three weeks' meeting at Houston, Mo., with 35 additions. Bro. D. B. Warren led the singing. I will take up the evangelistic work again the first of June to continue a few months only. I have a tabernacle with a seating capacity of 450 that I can furnish without extra expense if it is desired. Churches contemplating a meeting during the four months following May, and desiring my services may address me here.—E. E. DAVIDSON.

NEBRASKA.

Auburn, Neb., Mar. 18.—Am singing in meeting here with D. A. Wickizer. Meeting less than two weeks old, 9 additions to date. Bad weather to contend with but getting better. Good interest; will be open for engagement as soon as meeting closes here.—GEO. W. MUTZ.

Grand Island, Neb., March 12.—Two accessions last Lord's day; one two weeks ago. W. H. Waggoner is holding an institute for us this week. Large audiences. R. M. Marshall, of Rock Creek, O., begins a protracted meeting next Monday. Smallpox scare has blocked our work for over two months, but we are still hopeful and encouraged.—Z. O. DOWARD.

Omaha, Neb., March 12.—The word having gone out that I was to leave here to become city evangelist of San Francisco, it is proper now to state that the good people here protested so earnestly that I determined to remain. We are in the midst of our preparations for a great meeting to be led by Bro. Scoville, beginning soon. We are having additions every Sunday; 116 since last April.—SUMNER T. MARTIN.

OHIO.

Painesville, O., Mar. 11.—Closed a four weeks' meeting last night. Bro. DeLoss Smith, of Irvington, Ind., led our song service. Our people were well pleased with his work. There had been a union meeting during January in which there were twenty signed cards of intention to lead a Christian life. We received twelve, six of whom had signed the cards; thirty-one additions. Our Bible-school for 1899 averaged 143 in attendance. For 1900, it averaged 176. The average for the four Sundays of our meeting was 239. We hope for a new auditorium this summer.—F. A. BRIGHT.

Trimble, O., Mar. 9.—Meeting here resulted in 16 additions. W. H. Boden, pastor, did the preaching. My services can be secured after April 15.—JOHN JOYCE, singer.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Oklahoma City, O. T., March 11.—We closed our first month with the brethren in this city yesterday. Twenty-seven have been added to the local congregation. Our house is not large enough to accommodate the people. The church here is made up largely of young men and their families, and is, numerically, the strongest in the city. At the close of our service last Sunday morning I asked the Disciples who were not members of our local congregation to stand that we might know them. A large number arose representing the following states: Missouri, Nebraska, Kansas, Iowa, Illinois, Michigan and Tennessee. They all seem to think it a good place to be. I succeed our good brother, J. B. Boen, in the work here. Bro. Boen did a good work here and has many warm friends both in and out of the church.—S. D. DUTCHER.

OREGON.

Eugene, Oregon.—Among the students of the Eugene (Ore.) Divinity School, the following report recent additions to the church by obedience: D. Olson, Walterville, three; J. J. Handsaker, Lancaster, two; F. A. Ware, Slayton, two.—J. J. HANDSAKER.

NEW YORK.

Tonawanda, N. Y., March 15.—Last evening a new church was organized at North Tonawanda, to be known as the Central Church of Christ. At the first meeting 33 joined the organization, three by confession. By next Lord's day we expect almost as many more. This gives us three churches in this city.—GEORGE F. RAND.

VIRGINIA.

Norfolk, Va.—One by letter and one baptism Sunday, March 10.—ALBERT BUXTON.

A Dream.

By Ernest Bagley.

I dreamed an angel led me by the hand,
'Mid crystal walls and gleaming gates of gold,
And on those gleaming gates a legend ran,
The City where no sorrow groweth old.

I marveled, and unto the shining one
In wondering awe, I lifted eager eyes,
"Can there be no escape, then, for the soul?
Shall grief pursue us, even in Paradise?"

He smiled, and touched my raiment, and behold,
Methought we stood beside a murmurous river,
Whose mist-bathed waters flowed in limpid light
Beyond the gates, and on and on forever.

He touched my hand and pointed overhead,
And, mirrored there, the shining river rolled,
And written on the dazzling dome I read
The City where no sorrow groweth old.

I woke—but thought in darkness I could see
God's purposes, like the lilies, slow unfold,
And pain, at last, was sweetest and Heaven may be
The City where no sorrow groweth old.

Hugh Lyman's Reformation.

By Mrs. T. H. Kuhn.

She sat peering out into the darkness, her face pressed close against the window pane. Every now and then a deep sigh escaped her trembling lips. A thousand memories came and went. Sometimes they were sweet memories but more often they were sad as death itself.

What a glad, happy childhood she had spent in the old home, surrounded by loving father and mother and kind brothers and sisters. They did not know, they never would know, they never should know, what she suffered.

She had been such a beautiful girl, with great dark sparkling eyes, rosy cheeks and clusters of dark-brown curls. She had had many suitors for her hand in marriage, in those glad days. She never would forget the day Hugh Lyman came across her path. How handsome he was, so tall and stately, so cultured. He had fallen in love with this dark-haired beauty and she with him. A happy courtship followed and a happier marriage. She would never forget how, when they had gone to their own home, he had taken her in his arms and said that he hoped all the days of her life would be as joyous as this.

"Ah," thought Kathie Lyman, "if I had known, I would much rather that he should have been taken from me than to have spent so many happy years with him and then that he should forget the vows he made at God's sacred altar. Day by day I have watched him as he went down into this pit of death, this hell of intemperance. My heart almost breaks when I think of my poor, poor Hugh as he was then and as he is now. Then he let no want go unsupplied, but now we go hungry and cold, and yet he seems indifferent. How I toil all day to get bread, while he spends all his earnings for drink—and yet he pays no heed.

"They tell me to leave him, to get a divorce, to be free of him—but I cannot, I love him. Some day, perhaps—some day my darling will come back to me the same I could curse that fair, jeweled hand that passed the cup of wine that night at the banquet. Why did she not know that it was an unrighteous act? But they say it is fashionable for a fair hand to extend the wine cup. But he should never touch it were it to do over again, I would snatch it from his lips.

If I could bring that woman clad in her richest robes to my home to-night; if I could show her these carpetless floors, the broken chairs and table, the scanty cupboard; if Hugh should come staggering in and she could see this once handsome man with bloated face and eyes that are afire with drink; if I should bare my arms and she could see the bruises upon them, and if I could bare my heart to her and she could know the heartaches I have suffered, would she, could she, pass another cup of wine with such an alluring smile as she did that night eight years ago?"

Just at that moment one of the children stirred, and going to cover it she turned and heard the footsteps of her drunken husband. She opened the door and assisted him up the steps and into the house and seated him in the one rocker that remained as a happy reminder of their once cozy home.

He was not in a quarrelsome mood to-night but in a stupor, and she was glad. She sat down near him, but with her face averted, and gazed long and intently at the smoldering embers in the grate. Never before had she suffered so keenly as she was suffering now.

Once in awhile Hugh Lyman raised his bloated face. He knew enough to be conscious that he had never seen such a look on his wife's face before, yet he sat as speechless as the dead.

They had sat together for hours; neither had spoken. She had looked pityingly at the swaying figure and once, when he attempted to move and almost fell, she put out her hand and steadied him. He looked up at her as a baby looks at its mother when in distress.

She had lost faith in prayer. Had she not prayed incessantly for years? No answer came. Hugh went on in the same old way. At first she did not chide him. Then the time came when she could no longer appear indifferent. After that she had scolded, reasoned, implored, but all in vain.

To-night she neither scolded nor pleaded. Her heart was too full; she longed to have some one to whom she could go and confide her sorrow; to sob and cry until there were no more tears to be shed.

But no; she would not let him see her cry, it might anger him. She must strive to be brave.

They had sat there until the gray streaks of light began to steal across the star-lit sky. Still they had not spoken; but he had straightened up and was in a measure sober.

She fastened her eyes upon some object in front of her, with a blank, hopeless look upon her once beautiful face. He, turning, saw that face—the face of the woman he had sworn to love and cherish, the face that was once radiant with happiness, but now so hopelessly sad. It cut him to the heart. What a demon he was to wreck poor Kathie's life; to take her from a home where luxury abounded and make such a home as he had made for her.

He gazed around the room; he saw the little bed in the corner upon which his two children lay slumbering, all unconscious of the sorrow about them. He saw the carpetless floors, the broken chairs, the bare walls, then, turning, he looked at his wife. There was the same dejected, hopeless look on her face. Then like a flash it came to him that Kathie was insane.

He gazed at her intently for some time thinking he might discover a change—perhaps she would look at him. He called her by name. She heeded him not. He grew frightened, then, dragging himself from his chair, he went to her side, knelt at her feet, took the cold, trembling hands in his own, and spoke her name oh so tenderly, "Kathie, my darling, what ails you?" She gave him no answer, but a shudder ran over her and he, still holding her hands, felt it. "Kathie, please tell me," he cried imploringly. "Please tell me." Still no answer came. She did not even look at him. Her sorrow had overwhelmed her. He still sat holding the dear cold hands, chafing them tenderly. At last with a wild, bitter cry he called, "Kathie, darling, don't you hear me?" She turned her face toward him and looking straight into his eyes gazed long and earnestly at him. She had seen him sorry before. He had been on his knees many, many times. But there was something written on his face to-night she had never seen there befere. Was it a desperate resolve?

THE COLUMBUS CARRIAGE AND HARNESS CO., Box 772, Columbus, O.

No. 240. Single Strap Buggy Harness. Price $7.95.

She murmured softly, "Dear Hugh," so softly he scarcely heard.

In a moment his arms were about her and he lay sobbing violently, his head buried in the folds of her dress. They remained thus, not caring to count the time, she lovingly stroking his head while the tear drops stole silently over her pale cheeeks.

The gray dawn had fled, taking with it the few glimmering stars.

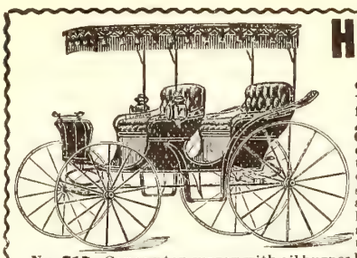
Hugh Lyman drew himself up and said, "Kathie dear, listen to me. My poor, wounded, heart-broken Kathie, will you still be mine? You do not mean to leave me, do you?"

For somehow that thougnt had impressed him as he lay weeping. Continuing he said—

"Please try me once more, dear, try to be brave. I have a plan whereby I may be able to overcome. In the morning when I go to my work accompany me past the saloons and in the evening come to meet me, and come with me all the way to our home. My old associates will not bother me if you are near me. When we are home sit by me for a while, get our supper, and then, Kathie, we will sit together. Keep your hand in mine, oh Kathie, lead me like a little child for I am not a man. I have lost all the will power I ever possessed. Sit close by me, darling, and when the clock strikes seven, we will kneel together and pray to the dear God whose name I have so dishonored, that he will keep me safe until eight o'clock, and when eight o'clock comes we will pray that for another hour he will keep me, and when bedtime comes it may be I can pass the night without the old wild longing seizing me. Won't you try, Kathie, won't you try to love me for the sake of what I once was, and help me to be a better husband, a better father?"

The fount of tears so long suppressed burst forth into a torrent of weeping. Her poor little tired body shook from head to foot. He had never seen her weep so before, he drew her to the chair and clasped her in a close embrace, saying all the while, "I will conquer for your sake, dear."

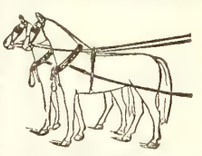
The next day Kathie went with him past the saloons as he went to his work. People wondered that she held his hand; the hand of a man lay helpless in the hand of a woman.



When they were safe at home Kathie stayed near by. While she prepared their supper she had him sit where she could talk to him, and chatted so gayly you would never guess her heart was almost breaking.

She watched every move he made, and once when she saw he was growing restless, she went up to him, put her arms about his neck and said: "Here is my hand, Hugh." He took the hand she offered, kissed it, and sat down. When they had finished their supper, they knelt and asked the dear heavenly Father to heep him from temptation, to forgive his great sin, and after this they sat reading God's word, and talking. An hour passed swiftly away. God had kept him safe. He would pray again. "Oh for the strength to overcome."

When they had retired he had prayed fervently that God would sustain him.



In the night Kathie felt that Hugh was growing restless again, that it was a desperate struggle, she gave him her hand saying,

"Hugh, my hand is strong with a strength God has given it. Hold fast."

ELKHART CARRIAGE & HARNESS MANUFACTURING CO., Elkhart, Indiana.

He clasped again the hand that was to help him steer clear of temptation and held it as in a vice.

The next morning Kathie went with him again, past the saloons. When he kissed her good-bye she whispered, "I shall pray every hour of the day, dear; you must do the same. You shall conquer."

And he did, with this brave woman to help him, and the help from above. By and by the roses returned to Kathie's cheeks; the poor little home was left behind and a neat and roomy cottage took the place of the mean and shabby one. The larder was now plentifully stored. Hugh was once more a strong man; he does not need the little hand of Kathie now to guide him past the saloons, for he hates them with a deadly hatred. Sometimes he takes the hand of his dear wife in his own, and looking upward cries, "Oh God, I thank Thee that through my loved one's hands I found the strength of Thine, for she could not have led me without Thy aid."

Mr. Long, the Linguist of the Cabinet.

The metrical translation of the Æneid, by Mr. John D. Long, Secretary of the Navy, put out by one of the publishing houses, is a surprise to the public, but not to the secretary's intimate friends.

The President and the members of the Cabinet have known for the last four years that the Secretary of the Navy is one of the ablest of Latin scholars.

Mr. Long is a reserved man, modest in regard to his own attainments, and so the public has never found out what a remarkable scholar is at the head of the Navy Department. He has a fine library, has a rare knowledge of old editions, and speaks and writes Latin with the ease and fluency of English. He is one of the few men who can deliver an entire address in classical Latin.

His knowledge of Latin has often been called upon by the Administration, but it was when he was Governor of Massachusetts that he made his translation of the Æenid and of the Odes of Horace.

His memory is as remarkable as his knowledge and he can quote Virgil in Latin or in an English translation without hesitation, and can continue from page to page.

Latin is his specialty and Virgil is his hobby; but outside of this his knowledge of the classics, his familiarity with the dead languages, and his memory combine to make him the greatest scholar in the Administration, and one of the most scholarly men in public life. He is a graduate of Harvard, and that university recently gave him the degree of LL. D. —Saturday Evening Post.

Yank and Reb.

Gen. John B. Gordan, who is one of the two living witnesses of the surrender of Lee at Appomattox Court House, recently addressed the students at the University of Missouri. He spoke particularly of the friendly personal relations which often existed between soldiers in the hostile armies.

"Some funny things," said the general, as reported by the Columbia Herald, "occurred now and then even in the gravest and most perilous situations. At one place we had planned to open fire at daylight. Our troops were behind breastworks and I sent out a soldier to reconnoiter. He discovered a federal sentinel at no great distance, and told him not to fire, as he was out hunting corn. The sentinel feigned sleep so as to allow the scout to hunt for the corn. The latter returned to his lines, and reported the situation of the enemy, and it was made his duty to give the signal for opening fire by shooting his musket. The next morning the commander had difficulty in getting him to obey the order, as he did not have the heart to fire a signal which would probably mean the death of the kind-hearted sentinel who had befriended him. After delaying as long as he could he leaped upon the embankment and shouted 'Wake up, Yank, I've got my corn and am going to shoot!' and then waiting long enough for the sentinel to get beyond range, fired his gun into the air and a great battle began."

The private soldiers of the two armies were in the habit of paying visits to each other secretly when they could evade the officers and of exchanging food and tobacco. The latter article was about all the confederates had, and they would barter this for coffee and crackers and meat. They also would attend entertainments. A federal colonel had told him of an instance in North Carolina where a number of rebs had come into the federal lines and had been dressed in federal uniform, one little fellow being dressed in clothes three times too large for him, and after dancing all night, returned to their lines before breakfast and resumed their places in the battle the next morning.

Little Wanterknow.

There was once a little urchin with a very curious mind;
The how and why of everything he always wished to find.
He was always asking questions, wherever he might go,
And all the folks that knew him called him "Little Wanterknow."

He'd want to know "How far it is from here up to the sky?"
And "What made George so awful sure he couldn't tell a lie?"
What made the noise inside his drum, and why a cow don't fly;
And, "How much would a million million million dollars buy?"

And also, if you pleased, he'd like to know about these things:
"When will to morrow come?" and, "Are the stars all worked with strings?"
"How big'll I be when I'm big?" and, "Ain't it tea-time yet?"
And, "Why it's cold in winter," and "What makes water wet?"

And "Do all naughty boys get drownded?" and, "Do all good ones die?"
And, "Do you think that doughnuts are better'n berry pie?"
And, "Where does money come from?" and, "When is by and by?"
And when his questions all gave out, he'd simply say, "Well—why?"

The Chaplain's Horse Trade.

As Chaplain in a regiment of volunteer calvary during the Spanish war Rev. Cyrus Townsend Brady had some amusing experiences, some of which he narrates in the Sunday School Times.

"I reached camp at Chickamauga on Saturday," he says, "had service on Sunday, and on Monday proceded to buy a horse. Being a sailor by education and natural predilection, I knew but little about horses, so I turned over the conduct of negotiations to an old trooper of the Seventh United States Calvary who had enlisted with us. He bought the horse.

"He took me to see him, and I was present when the purchase was consummated. He stood by the seller, and calmly pointed out defect after defect in the animal, which the other man repudiated vehemently, at the same time calling attention to perfection after perfection in his steed. I never saw such divergent views about a single animal. Finally, alarmed at the zeal of my advocate, I remarked decisively that, if the horse had all the faults he said it had, I didn't want him at any price, whereupon the seller with alarming promptness came down in his figures to a reasonable basis, and, before I could utter a protest, the horse was my own. As I had unequivocally committed the negotiation to the ex-trooper, I felt that I was in honor bound to abide by his decision. We led the horse away, I confess, with a very rueful, disgusted feeling on my part. When we were a short distance off, the trooper remarked, chuckling with glee: 'That was a fine play of yours, Chaplain. I didn't know you were so keen in a horse-trade, sir. That just settled the deal. That was mighty cute, I tell you. You had the fellow scared. A little more on your part, and we'd 'a' got him for nothin'.'

" 'Keen? Cute?' I exclaimed in surprise. 'I was perfectly honest in what I said. I didn't want a broken-down old hack such as you described. Why, look at that, and that, and that!'

"I pointed to various blemishes which he had indicated during the trade. He stared at me in amazement a moment, and then fairly shouted with laughter, apologizing the while, until it gradually dawned upon me that it was simply a case of balancing lies and assertions, and that I had been guilty of aiding and abetting the deal, and that he had taken an honest refusal for an adroit move. I always felt that I got that horse under false pretenses, but, however that may be, he was undoubtedly the best horse in the regiment. Every other officer who owned a horse, I admit, was ready to make the same claim, but I knew my own bore the palm."

The Giant Robber Crab.

In Central America there lives the robber crab, of almost incredible size, and somewhat resembling a huge spider. The distance between its extended claws is sometimes as great as twelve feet. It spends the greater part of its life on land and climbs the cocoanut trees, on the fruit of which it lives almost entirely. It digs in the ground deep tunnels and lines them with cocoanut fibre.

When enraged, the robber crab can break a man's limb with its powerful claws. Animals approaching it too closely often receive an ugly pinch which they do not soon forget, and it is on record that one of these crabs has captured and tried to drag off a goat.

To open a cocoanut the robber crab removes the bark from the end containing the three eyes, one only of which is easily pentrated, and having found this, it revolves the nut against the point of one of its spindle legs until the opening is large enough for it to insert its great claw. With this it breaks the shell; grinds the contents into small pieces and carries them to its mouth.

The lovely Hiawathan spring was touching all things in the fairy Badlands. Oh, why are they called Badlands? If Nature sat down deliberately on the eighth day of creation and said, "Now work is done, let's play. Let's make a place that shall combine everything that is finished, and wonderful, and beautiful. A paradise for man, and bird, and beast," it was surely then that she made these wild, fantastic hills, teeming with life, radiant with gayest flowers, varied with sylvan groves, bright with prairie sweeps, and brimming lakes and streams. In foreground, offing, and distant hills that change at every step, we find some proof that Nature squandered here the riches that in other lands she used as sparingly as gold—with colorful sky above, and colorful land below, and the distance blocked by sculptured buttes that are built of precious stones and ores, and tinged as by a lasting and unspeakable sunset. And yet for all this ten times gorgeous wonderland enchanted, blind man has found no better name than one which says "the road to it is hard."—Ernest Seton-Thompson.

The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful it Is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines, and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking, or after eating onions or other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion; it whitens the teeth; and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics, in tablet form, or rather in the form of large, pleasant-tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood; and the beauty of it is that no harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

An Exaggerated Death Notice.

Hon. John A. Kasson, Special Reciprocity Commissioner of the United States, had the unusual experience the other day of seeing how his friends would receive the news of his death. He is one of the governors of the Metropolitan Club, in Washington. He was at the department of State when the news of Queen Victoria's death reached there, and, learning that the Federal buildings were to half-mast their flags, stepped to the nearest telephone to notify the club of what had happened. His ring was answered by one of the club stewards, a new employee. The wires were working badly that day.

"Hello!" called Mr. Kasson. "The Queen has just died. Lower the club flag to half-mast, and put up a bulletin making the announcement."

"Who is it?" came back rather huskily. "Stand a little nearer the telephone. I can't make out all you say."

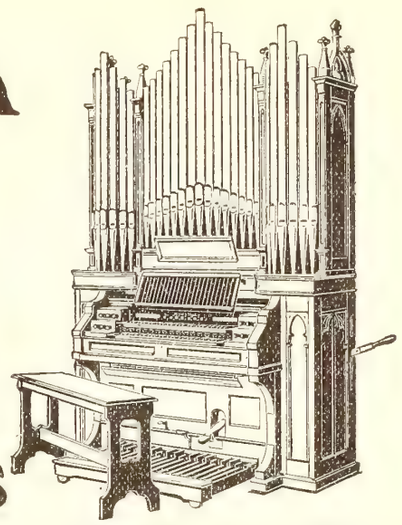
"Who is it?" echoed the Commissioner, shouting. "It is Mr. Kasson—John A. Kasson—one of the governors of the club. It's all right. Do as I tell you."

"Oh!" answered the steward. "Now I hear a little better. Thank you. I'll give the message to the clerk."

"Very well," said Mr. Kasson. "Good-by!" And he hung up the receiver and rang off.

After dictating a note or two and clearing his desk of a few accumulated papers, Mr. Kasson put on his hat and overcoat and strolled over to the club to see what the evening papers had about the sad intelligence from London. He found the flag at half-mast, and a general air of mourning pervaded the outside of the building. Within, he noticed a group of club members gathered around the bulletin-board, making comments in subdued voices. Nobody noticed his approach till he touched one of the men on the outside fringe of the group. The man turned, gasped, stammered, and clutched his next neighbor by the arm. The second man wheeled and stared at Mr. Kasson with a suddenly blanched face and open mouth. As the two fell back, the Commissioner got near enough to the board to read:

"The Hon. John A. Kasson, for many years an honored member of the club and one of its governors, died to-day. The news was received by telephone, but without particulars. A special meeting of the Board of Governors has been called for this evening at eight o'clock to take appropriate action."



It took Mr. Kasson about three seconds to tear down the bulletin, but as many hours or more to explain to interested friends how it all happened.

An Obliging River.

"It's a freakish river, the Rio Grande, and no mistake," said a former federal official of New Mexico, in talking with a representative of the New York Sun. "For the fifteen hundred miles of its course its character is everything by turns from navigable water to dry land. At its head, in the mountainous San Juan country in Colorado, it is a cold, clear trout stream; in northern New Mexico its waters are brown with sand in solution. Farther south, where the liquid mud of the Rio Puereo (Dirty River) pours into it, its waters become densely muddy, and all along on its long way to the sea this queer river takes on one or another new feature, different from anything that has preceded it.

"The Rio Grande has a habit of going under ground here and there along its course, leaving a dry channel above, from which it reappears anywhere from a mile to fifty miles below. It also has quicksands and burrowing eels and catfish. But one of its most peculiar performances was the way it served the town of Mesilla in southern New Mexico. The place is a picturesque, dignified-looking old Spanish-American community, built about a plaza, with orchards and vineyards surrounding, and stood in the beginning on the west bank of the river. But its people had one cause of complaint. The routes of all the traffic from Texas and the north lay on the east of the Rio Grande, and stages and wagons must ford the river getting to and from Mesilla. This was inconvenient at all times, and involved danger and delay in times of flood.

" 'Que lastima!' (What a pity) the people often said. 'If only our town stood on the east bank of the river.'

"Their wish came to pass at last in a startling way. There was an unusually heavy snowfall in the mountains of the upper country one winter, and, the spring opening warm, the snow melted, with the result of a tremendous flood in the lower Rio Grande. The waters overspread the level valley until Mesilla, which luckily had been built on an eminence, became an island. The waters at last subsided, and hen the discovery was made that the Rio Grande, instead of keeping to its old bed on the east, was flowing past the town, a mile to the west of the plaza.

"It was what the people had said they wanted, but it took them some time to become used to the change, and get their landmarks and points of the compass to tally with the new order of things.

"There are orchards and alfalfa fields in the old chanmel now, but its course can plainly be traced on the face of the ground; and who knows when the Rio Grande may take a notion to return to the old bed and set the maps at fault again."

A dog boasted that he caught more fleas than any other animal; when a cat said, "If you were more active in avoiding fleas, you would not have to be so expert in catching them."—Leslie's Monthly.

PETE.

XIII.—Madge Stops Speaking.

Arthur Pendleton went through his front gate, sat down on the sidewalk, and brooded. He was angry and ashamed and miserable. He reviewed the past as he dug a hole in the road with a broken stick. It is true that he had told Eliza Bimby a story. He had told her the girls were not hiding in the woodpile. But why had he committed this sin? Because Madge had threatened not to go with him to the party if he told. For her sake he had trampled upon the truth. And what was his reward? Madge had turned from him with a look of disdain. She did not appreciate the sacrifice. He felt her injustice keenly. Ned Tomkins and Oliver Ridgeway (better known as Freckle Ridgeway) came down the sidewalk, looking happy in bare feet and suspenders. Arthur did not inquire where they were going. "Let's see your stick," said Freckles with natural interest. Arthur went on prodding the hole in the road. At first he thought of answering "The'nt no C on it," but he did not feel equal to the effort. "Come on, Freckle," said Ned, "tain't nothing but an old maple-branch." "Well," said Freckle, "what's he digging the hole fur?" He put his hands on his bare knees, and tried to look down into the hole. Again Arthur almost replied, but he found the natural retort, "Cat-fur," out of keeping with his wretched feeling of isolation. "Come on, Freckle," said the impatient Ned. "Leave him be. I'll bet he's goin' to take a gal to Linda May's party, an' he's spoonin' over her." "I ain't!" cried Arthur, turning red.

"Aw, look at him blush!" cried Ned. "Aw, look a-a-at him!" Freckle echoed, "Aw, look at 'im!" "It isn't so!" cried Arthur, jumping up. "There isn't a girl in town I'd take to a party." " 'Cause you can't!" cried Ned. " 'Cause you can't!" echoed Freckle. " 'Cause he can't!" cried Jim Pimlins, who had joined the group. "Yes I can too," retorted Arthur. "I can take my pick of 'em, and they'd be glad enough. Girls ain't nothing to me." When Arthur grew excited, his grammar was the first thing to suffer. The three boys uttered a skeptical, "Aw! aw! aw! yes, that's what we thought!" This was more than Arthur could endure. He slapped his pocket. "I've got a note right here," he cried, "accepting my comp'ny; but I ain't goin' with 'er. I'm goin' with the boys. I won't take a girl!"

Arthur had not decided to punish Madge in this manner for her injustice, till the words were spoken. Now, however, he was resolved. He would teach her a lesson. She had made him tell a story, then had despised him for the deed. "Sight your note!" demanded Jim, meaning, produce the same. Arthur wouldn't. "Come," said Ned, "tell us who it's from and we'll believe you." Arthur said he didn't care whether they believed him or not. "Le's take it away from him," counselled Jim Pimlins. "Freckle, you git behine him while I tackle him on his front exposure."

"I ain't goin' do it," said Freckle. " 'Tain't fair." "Well, I will," cried Ned. "You better look out!" said Arthur, doubling his fists. They quarrelled for about ten minutes in the spirited, red-faced manner so congenial to boys, and at the end of that time Arthur found himself lying on the road with Ned seated upon his stomach, and Jim holding his legs. There was nothing to disturb the fun. Generally, grown people happen along, or a fellow's sister or mother, and ring down the curtain on an unfinished act. But on this occasion, only five or six boys happened up the street. They made a circle about the gladiators, and slapped their knees, spread their mouths in gigantic grins, and gave other tokens of their appreciation. "You get off of me," said Arthur, "Oh! I am smothering. You will kill me!" Ned tried to sit heavier. He had been in Arthur's position and he knew there was no immediate danger. "Then I give up," cried Arthur, "Now you've got to get up." Ned demanded, "Who wrote that note?" No answer. Ned sat heavier. "If you don't tell, Artie, I'll git your old note and keep it, too!" "Madge," said Arthur, breathlessly. Ned got up regretfully. It gave him a thrilling delight to sit on other lads' stomachs; he wasn't a very bad boy, either—just a boy. "Madge wrote it," he said. Freckle and Jim repeated "Madge wrote it!" The spectators took up the cry; "Madge wrote it! Madge wrote it!" Then they all raised a loud chorus of "Aw! aw! aw!" Arthur got up, very red and dusty, and tried to smile unconcernedly. He explained that it had been two against one; also that he would "pay" Ned and Jim for their cowardly attack. Jim and Ned insisted on his "paying" them right now, but Arthur marched into his yard with dignity. The boys passed up the street, discussing the various features of the late exhibition. Twenty times they related the manner in which Arthur had bloodied Jim's nose. They dwelt lovingly on the manner in which Ned had twisted his fingers in Arthur's hair. In short they were young barbarians. The next day it was "all over school" that Madge had agreed to accompany Arthur Pendleton to the party, and that Arthur Pendleton had declared "to the whole town" that he wasn't going to take her, anyhow! He could have his pick of the entire girl-universe, he had said, but not being a lady's man, he intended to go with the boys. Madge heard these rumors at first with incredulity. They were repeated. She said to him at noon, "Did you say you were not going with me to Linda May's party, Arthur Pendleton?"

"You made me tell a story about your hiding in that old woodpile," said Arthur, "and then you blamed me for doing it."

"I didn't make you tell a story. But that isn't what I said."

"It's what I said," retorted Arthur.

"Arthur Pendleton, did you say what all the girls and boys are saying, that you are not going with me to Linda May's party?"

"Yes I said it, and I'm not!" said Arthur doggedly.

"All right," said Madge, her eyes flashing. "And, Arthur Pendleton, I never want you to speak to me again as long as you live!"

"Well, I won't!" cried Arthur.

"Well, see that you don't!" said Madge.

So Madge told the girls what she had said to Arthur, and how they had "quit speaking," and the girls felt that she was a sort of heroine. "I wish," said Pete, "that there was somebody I could stop speaking to. Oh, Madge, won't it be fun just to go along with your head up in the air, a-making out that you don't see him when you pass! It will be just like some of the old women in our church, won't it! Oh, Madge! Are you getting ready to join the church?"

IN SOME CASES

A Single Package of the Pyramid Pile Cure is Sufficient to Cure.

This may seem a broad statement when it is remembered that few diseases are so obstinate to really cure as piles; some physicians going so far as to say that a painful surgical operation is the only permanent cure, but the many and remarkable cures made by the Pyramid Pile Cure in the past few years have proven that surgical operations are no longer necessary, and that it is by far the safest and most reliable remedy yet discovered for this common and often dangerous trouble.

The harmless acids and healing oils contained in the Pyramid Pile Cure cause the blood vessels to contract to a natural condition and the little tumors are absorbed and the cure is made without pain, inconvenience or detention from business.

Dr. Williams, a prominent orificial surgeon says: "It is the duty of every surgeon to avoid an operation if possible to cure in any other way and after many trials with the Pyramid Pile Cure I unhesitatingly recommend it in preference to an operation."

Mr. Phil Owens, of So. Omaha, writes that after suffering two years from an aggravated case of itching and protruding piles he was cured by a single 50 cent package of the Pyramid Pile Cure purchased from a local druggist, he says, "I fully expected the trouble would return but am happy to say for the past year and a half have been entirely free from the disease and I can not speak too warmly in favor of the Pyramid Pile Cure."

A bill clerk in one of the large wholesale houses of St. Louis says: "My occupation as billing clerk was so confining and sedentary that it finally brought on an aggravated attack of rectal trouble, which my physician diagnosed as itching and protruding piles and recommended a salve which he prepared and which gave me some relief for a few hours after using and then the trouble would come back as bad as ever; one of the other clerks advised me to try the Pyramid Pile Cure and I now feel like thanking him every day for recommending it, as a single 50 cent package cured me and I have had no trace of piles since, something over six months."

Hundreds of pile sufferers, who had almost decided to undergo the pain and danger of an operation, have been astonished to find that the Pyramid Pile Cure, which can be purchased at any drug store, was far safer, better and more effective than an operation could possibly be.

First Quarterly Review.*

The lessons for the past three months cover only one week in the life of our Savior. But that was the week that led up to, and culminated in, his death upon the cross, as the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. It was fitting that these few days, so full of the vital movement of the divine tragedy of redemption, should receive large attention at the hands of the evangelists, all of whom give far more space to this than to any equal portion of the life of Jesus. If we have faithfully studied the lessons of this quarter, we have drawn nearer our Lord and Savior, and have felt more deeply the surging tide of infinite love that flowed from God, through the Only Begotten Son, into and over a sinful race, to cleanse their hearts and redeem their lives.

The first lesson of the quarter called us to the village of Bethany, and to the house of Simon, the leper. Here a feast was made in honor of Jesus, on the Sabbath day, one week before his crucifixion. Lazarus and his sisters were present. The shadow of coming trouble had fallen upon the little group, to whom the Master had already foretold his coming death. Mary's loving heart prompted her to bring a vase of costly ointment to anoint the Savior. The covetous soul of Judas was moved to protest against what looked like waste, for the gifts of love can never be understood by selfishness. But the Master blessed her for her loving tribute, and declared that the story of her tender act should never be forgotten.

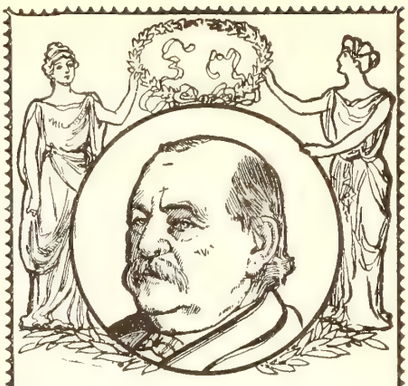
The following day, being the first day of the week, Jesus entered Jerusalem, riding, as a king upon the royal animal, the ass, and accompanied by the multitude of his disciples and Galilean friends. They spread in the way their garments, and branches of palm trees, and cried "Hosanna to the Son of David; blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord!" His crown was not one of gold, but of righteousness; his scepter not of earthly power, but of heavenly peace; his army not one of mail-clad warriors, breathing out slaughter, but of gentle, humble ministers of grace, consecrated to the world's redemption, and willing, like their king, to lay down their lives for their enemies.

It was, perhaps, during this day, while Jesus was lingering within the courts of the temple, that word was brought to him of the Greeks who desired to see him. He hastened forth to meet these representatives of the great Gentile world, from which his widest triumphs were to come. He saw in their seeking of him the first fruits of the mighty harvest that should glorify his mission, as the Savior of men. Through death was his life to reach its culmination, as the grain of wheat bears its fruit by dying beneath the soil. The cross becomes the symbol of both love and life, and he who is lifted up thereon is made thereby the center of the world's affection and hope.

The fourth lesson is that of Christ's interview with the Pharisees, wherein he silenced them by his matchless knowledge of the truth and purpose of God. It was Tuesday of passion week, and he was in one of the courts of the temple. He had already answered their attacks, from various sources, to their great discomfiture. They now rally for a final effort to confound him. They ask him, through one of the scribes, who seems to have been more honest than the majority, which was the great commandment in the law. He answers, enjoining love to God as the supreme obligation, and love to man as only second, while all other duties grow out of these. He in turn asks them a question concerning the Messiah, which they answer by saying that he was to be the son of David. Jesus then shows how David himself called the Messiah his Lord, which he could not have done if he were no more than mere man. They could not fail to understand him, and to see that he meant to teach that he himself, as the Messiah, was more than man, more than the son of David, even the Son of the living God.

The next two lessons contain two of the beautiful parables of the Savior, spoken while he was seated on the western slope of the Mount of Olives with his disciples, that same Tuesday afternoon, as he had paused on his return from Jerusalem to Bethany. The parable of the ten virgins was meant to impress upon his disciples the necessity of being watchful, after his departure, that they might be ready to welcome his return. The parable of the talents taught them that, while they waited for their Lord's coming, they should not be idle, but busy themselves with that task he had committed to their hands, that their service might be rewarded abundantly at his appearance. The same lesson is needed by us of these latter days as much as by those to whom it was spoken.

Jesus rested in Bethany during Wednesday of this last week of his ministry, and on Thursday he observed the Passover with his disciples. In the upper room in Jerusalem, where a friend had prepared for the feast, he met with them and spent a few hours in converse which they never forgot. He taught them humility by washing their feet like the humblest slave. He comforted their hearts, in view of his anticipated death, with the promise of the Holy Spirit as an abiding companion and helper. He bore them up to God in that wonderful intercessory prayer, found in John, seventeenth chapter, in which he also plead for the unity of his people in all the ages to come. He there instituted the Lord's Supper, as a memorial of his great love, and an expression of grateful remembrance and undying hope for his disciples. Ever since that night, the first day of the week has witnessed the loving observance of this feast by some of his believing followers.



From the upper room, Jesus went forth to Gethsemane, where he passed through the final struggle for complete self-submission to the will of God. His agonizing appeals, ending ever in the plaintive petition, "Thy will, not mine, be done," brought their answer, and he arose from the ground, wet with his tears and bloody sweat, a strong, calm man, ready to face the cruel mob and to suffer all that might be heaped upon him of shame and suffering.

The betrayal followed speedily, and with a kiss of feigned affection, the base traitor, Judas, pointed out his Master to the officers of the Jews and the Roman soldiers. Jesus awed them by his gentle dignity, and only when they summoned all their resolution did they dare to lay hands on the quiet, unarmed Nazarene. The ardent disciple, who would have used worldly weapons to defend his Lord, was taught that the kingdom of heaven needed not such aid as the sword could give, but must be built up and sustained by the power of truth and grace.

The two following lessons tell us the story of the trial of the Savior, in which there were six well-defined stages. The first was before Annas, the ex-high priest, and was an informal questioning of the prisoner. The second was before Caiaphas and the Jewish Sanhedrin, but was somewhat informal, since no legal meeting of the council could be held during the night. This trial is the one treated of in the tenth lesson, and despite the fact that it was not a legal session, the verdict reached therein was fully determined upon, and the death of Jesus made certain on the morrow. At daylight a third meeting was called, when the formal verdict was rendered, giving it a show of legality, and Jesus was hurried away to Pilate, that permission might be secured to enforce the penalty. Pilate examined Jesus, and found no fault in him. He sent him to Herod, who in turn declared him innocent. Again Pilate examined him, and became confident that he was a victim to the hate and envy of the Jewish rulers. He sought to secure his release, but finally yielded to their clamors, and gave sentence of death against the innocent.

The crucifixion was the theme of last Sunday's lesson, and its sad story of awful agony, of patient endurance, of self-forgetful love, is yet fresh in our memories. As the shadows gather over the land, we feel their chill entering our hearts. The quaking of the earth seems but the reaction from the trembling of our souls, as we read the story of human hate and divine mercy. Only as we turn from the dread scene on Calvary to recall the events that succeed it does the gloom pass from our spirits, and our hearts find themselves able to thank God for this exhibition of infinite love. Joyfully we turn, with the coming quarter's lessons, to the sequel of this week of sorrow and suffering, as read in the story of a risen Christ, a triumphant gospel, a glorious church and an eternal kingdom.

TOPIC FOR MARCH 31.

Missions: Love of Souls.

(Rom. 10:1.)

Love of souls, if translated into modern English, simply means love of people. If we ove men and women and are anxious to do them good, that is loving souls. And if we save men and women from wrong-doing and from such ignorance of the truth as always leads to wrong-doing, then are we saving souls. And he that winneth souls, or winneth people, the Scripture says, is wise.

Paul in the verse of our lesson is talking about the people of Israel. It is for them that his heart's desire and prayer to God is. He knows their weaknesses, their mistakes, their rejection of Christ, but there is nothing that can break his affection for them or hinder his love.

It was such love of people as this which made Paul the great missionary that he was. It is such love of our fellowmen that will make us—you and me—missionary people. If we see whole nations who are sunk in errors, mistakes, rejection of the highest opportunities that are before them; if we see them groveling in the dirt, drinking stagnant water, living in sinful polygamy, persecuting widows, slaying innocent children and giving way to a thousand wickednesses, is it not our prayer and heart's desire for them that they be saved? And shall we not do something for their salvation?

Suppose I have a brother that is dear to me, or a sister. Suppose I see that brother or sister standing at my front gate all pale and ragged and sick and bleeding with sores. Suppose I see their hands outstretched crying to me for help. Do you suppose I would not go to them in an instant? It would be a more potent call than a vision of a man of Macedonia saying to me, "Come over and help us." And do we not every one of us have brothers and sisters in the hunger and the distress of heathen lands, beckoning us to come to them?

Or, again, to borrow an illustration from Robert Speer. Suppose my father in dying, calls me to his bedside and says:

"Son, here's the old farm of one hundred acres. It is yours now. I hope you'll farm it well. Plow it, sow it, reap it all, every acre of it."

"I will, father," is my reply.

Then my father dies and I go out and fence off ten acres in one corner of that farm. I plow and sow and reap that ten acres and let the ninety go to grow up in weeds and thistles. Am I obeying my father? Jesus' last command to us was: "Go to all the world, preach to every creature." We have gone to but a very small portion of the great world.

If we loved Christ and if we loved men, it would not be long until we had fulfilled this command.

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

APPLEGATE.

Mary A. Kerr Applegate was born in Crawford county, Pa, May 19, 1834, and removed with her parents to Trumbull county, Ohio, when but a few months old, where she lived until her marriage to Elder G. L. Applegate at Warren, Ohio, Aug. 12, 1858. In 1865 they removed to Iowa. Her death occurred March 3, 1901, as the result of a stroke of paralysis nearly one year before. As a pastor's wife she was an heroic success, a faithful C. W. B. M. worker, a kind mother and a devoted Christian who will be missed in all kinds of church work.

J. G. ENGELL.

CLARK.

George Clark was born in Knox co., Indiana, Nov. 15, 1828, and died at Hebron, Ark., Feb. 24, 1901. His ministerial life covered half a century, nearly all of it in pioneer work. His preaching was chiefly in Missouri, Texas, and Arkansas. He was preaching at Okalona and Gurdon and giving half time as evangelist of the southwestern Arkansas district, at the time of his death. He was with the writer in a meeting at Hebron when the call came. He died suddenly sitting in his chair. He leaves his aged companion, several grandchildren, and a host of friends. All his children preceded him to the spirit land. He was buried at Texarkana. E. S. ALLHANDS.

CLISER.

James M. Cliser was born in Page county, Virginia, May 16, 1829 and died at his home near Barnard, Mo., Feb. 19, 1901, aged 71 years, 9 months and 3 days. In the year 1847 he moved with his father from his native state to Andrew county, Mo. where he was married to Louisa Best, Dec. 28, 1854, and in the spring of 1855 removed to Nodaway county, Mo., where he has since lived. To their union were born eleven children, five of whom, together with their mother, have preceded him. On May 24, 1877, he was married to Mary J. Hall, who survives him. He obeyed the gospel in the latter part of the sixties and has since lived an exemplary Christian life. He has been for 31 years an elder of Salem congregation and ruled well in word and teaching and was worthy of double honor, for to him is largely due the successes of Salem congregation. In him the missionary societies had a warm friend and a staunch supporter, and he passed none of them by. He was enthusiastic in supporting and encouraging the Endeavor Society, and always was found in his place in the Sunday-school. It was while attending these services in Old Salem Church that he was stricken with his last sickness. He was ready to depart and to be at home with the Lord. The funeral services were held in Salem Church conducted by the writer, after which the mortal remains were laid to rest and now await the last triumph of God.

F. E. BLANCHARD.

He united with the church in the winter of 1884 and has since lived faithful to his profession. At the time of his death he was serving as deacon of Salem church. YOUNG.

Mary Young, wife of Bro. H. D. Young, was born Dec. 5, 1861, and departed this life Feb. 28, 1901, aged 39 years, 2 months and 23 days. Sister Young had professed faith in Christ before her marriage, and since, with her husband, joined the Christian Church of Piatt, Ill., of which church she was a member at the time of her death. She leaves a husband, two daughters and many relatives. The funeral services were conducted by the writer. The bereaved have the sympathy of all.

R. W. PITTMAN.

WALTON.

Mr. Wesley Walton was born Sept. 20, 1831, died March 3, 1901, aged 69 years, 5 months and 13 days. He was the son of Frederick M. and Emily Rice Walton, both natives of Kentucky. Their parents were from Virginia and were of Welsh extraction. Fred Walton, his father, emigrated to Illinois in 1835, bringing with him two children, Wesley and John. Mr. Wesley Walton has lived in this community ever since. At the age of about 23 he married Martha L. Browning, Sept. 14, 1854, Bro. James Stark officiating. His wife died May 10, 1893, being 56 years old. On June 6, 1894, he was united in marriage to Emma Woods, by Bro. J. W. Carpenter, of Augusta, Ill. Early—when about 24 years of age—he united with the Christian Church, of which he has been a most faithful member, having officiated as elder for many years. He fell asleep Sunday morning, March 3, just as the sun arose, to awaken in that city "where the weary are at rest" The end was peaceful and without a struggle. The Master called him and he was ready. On the previous Lord's day, his last on earth, he presided at the communion table, and the following Wednesday evening at prayer-meeting he made a very touching prayer and talked to the young people of the "beautiful city," and how he was trying to reach it. He leaves behind him to mourn his loss his devoted wife, two brothers, John and Melger, one sister, Mrs. Matilda A. Harnest, and his aged mother, who is now over 90 years old. Besides the immediate family there is a host of relatives and friends, in fact the whole community, with whom he had taken a place that will long be left vacant. The funeral services were held at the Christian Church Tuesday, March 5, 1901, at 2 P. M., conducted by Rev. F. L. Ferguson, of Augusta, Ill.

An Extract from Her Letter.

"If you could only be here this winter morning and see for yourself you would no longer doubt me. Roses are blooming in our front yard and all nature is as far advanced in this lovely American summer-land as it will be in your cold eastern home by June.

"We made the journey from Omaha to the Golden Gate on the Union Pacific to avoid the circuitous routes—an important item in the winter. A trip to California is made delightful by the perfect service and luxurious accommodation of 'The Overland Limited,' which is perhaps the most finely equipped train in the world."

Book Notes.

Special Catalogue No. 31 is in course of preparation, and will soon be ready to send out. One year ago we issued our now famous Special Catalogue No. 22. It was a messenger of glad tidings, an announcement of the beginning of our policy of generally lowering the price of books. That policy we have steadily pursued. This present little pamphlet is the successor of the one issued last year. Like No. 22, it will be found to be full of genuine bargains in first-class literature. Further announcement will be made when it is ready for delivery.

In connection with the announcement of this special catalogue we wish to say that the last edition of our General Catalogue has had a far greater circulation than any predecessor. We do not scatter this book promiscuously, but are always glad to send it on request. Every day the mail brings us a large pile of such requests. The people are becoming interested in good literature and are learning that the headquarters for the literature of the Disciples of Christ is at St. Louis.

If you wish to choose a book for a gift to a friend you will hardly find anything more pleasing than Wheeling Through Europe, by W. E. Garrison. It is the account of two summers spent on a bicycle in the several countries of Europe. It is a most entertaining volume, beautifully printed and bound and illustrated with half-tone cuts made from photographs taken by the author. Price, $1.00.

For the regular Lord's day services of the church there is no other song book nearly so good as The Christian Hymnal. This is the book prepared under the direction of our General Convention. It contains the kind of music which is appropriate for religious services rather than the rag-time ditties which have attained a regrettable popularity in some localities. No other standard church hymnal is sold nearly so cheap as The Christian Hymnal. It contains over seven hundred fine hymns, yet costs no more than many books containing one-third as many selections of a much lower grade.

For convenience and practical worth the Moffett Church Register is unsurpassed. It is simple, yet complete. It is calculated to contain the complete records of a congregation. Price $2.00. A larger size, suitable for large city congregations, costs $3.50.

If you would have a clearer understanding of the doctrine concerning the Holy Spirit send for a copy of the Symposium on the Holy Spirit, the work of Alexander Campbell, J. Z. Taylor, A. B. Jones, Thomas Munnell and G. W. Longan. It is a book of 155 pages, bound in cloth, and the price has been reduced to 30 cents.

Among Our Advertisers.

Barclay Meador, Advertising Manager.

Some inquiries have come to our office concerning the Paquin Immune Company, of this city, whose advertisement appears in our columns. Having personal acquaintance with the company and their methods, we may speak publicly as we have done by letter.

This company has made a remarkable record for healing those addicted to the awful drink habit. Any number of instances are on record where those who have taken other cures and then fallen again into the clutches of the habit, have been redeemed to themselves, their families and the community.

Their treatment, which does not necessarily require withdrawal from participation in business, has the endorsement of many of the best citizens of St. Louis and the state. They have scores of letters which they are not at liberty to print, but may show personally. The home treatment mentioned in the advertisement is easily obtainable. Claims the company make may be depended upon. Immunity for which many have long struggled and prayed might possibly come through the aid this company offers.

Observing readers have not failed to note the fact that our subscribers' want column is growing in popularity. One subscriber wrote us recently as follows: "I am fully repaid in using your column for a business purpose in the demonstration that an appeal to brethren is not in vain."

The cost of an advertisement in the subscribers' want column is but one cent a word, hence the charge is not a barrier. If a reader wants to buy or sell an article or exchange locations, sell a business or buy one, let him try this column.

Say not the struggle naught availeth,
The labour and the wounds are vain,
The enemy faints not nor faileth,
And as things have been they remain.

If hopes were dupes, fears may be liars;
It may be, in yon smoke concealed,
Your comrades chase e'en now the fliers
And, but for you, possess the field.

For while the tired waves, vainly breaking,
Seem here no painful inch to gain,
far back, through creeks and inlets making,
Comes silent, flooding in, the main,

And not by eastern windows only,
When daylight comes, comes in the light,
In front the sun climbs slow, how slowly,
But westward, look, the land is bright.

Current Events.

British Military Organization. Lord Wolesley, as Commander-in-Chief of the British army, has borne patiently for a long while the criticisms which were directed at him for the unprepared condition of the army at the beginning of the war in South Africa and for the mismanagement of it in the early stages. A few days ago he defended himself in a speech in Parliament in which he gave the whole army organization a thorough overhauling. The trouble is, in his opinion, that the Commander-in-Chief is no longer allowed enough authority to do those things for the doing of which he is held responsible. The Adjutant-General and Quartermaster-General are not officers on his staff and accountable to him, but make their reports only to the Secretary of State for War and are accountable to him alone. The Secretary for War is a civilian and the result is that the army is under civilian control in those matters where expert management is most essential. Lord Lansdown replied that both the Commander-in-Chief and the Secretary for War are accountable to Parliament so that the army must ultimately be under civilian control in any case. The situation introduced by this colloquy between Lords Wolesley and Lansdown is singularly analogous to the long-standing difficulty in our own army management. Successive reorganizations have shunned the task of defining more accurately the relations between our civilian Secretary of War and the Commanding General. The unpleasant episode a year or two ago, involving the names of Gen. Miles, Gen. Eagan and Secretary Alger, was complicated by this indefiniteness. It is a thing which ought to be attended to in the armies of both countries.

Mr. Bryan's Advice. The attitude which Mr. Bryan has taken toward Mr. Rolla Wells, Democratic candidate for mayor of St. Louis, has added several more kinks to the already tangled skein of local politics. Mr. Wells is so excellent a gentleman that even his Republican opponents can find nothing worse to say of him than that he agrees with them on some of the national issues. He bolted his party in both of Mr. Bryan's campaigns and the ex-candidate is far from forgetting this fact. In successive issues of his "Commoner" he excoriated the St. Louis Democracy for stooping to nominate a man who was not faithful to it in either the First Battle or the second. Whoever is to be the prophet of the revived and victorious party, Mr. Bryan thinks that the prophet ought to be forced to come to the mountain. For the Democratic mountain to gird up its loins and transplant itself to the position which Prophet Wells has occupied during the last six years seems to him inconsistent with the dignity of the party. The election of Mr. Wells would, in his opinion, be a victory for the faction which wishes to reorganize the party by shifting it from the Chicago platform and finding for it a leader who does not live in Lincoln, Neb. In truth it looks very much that way. Mr. Bryan reads the signs aright. But he might have gone still farther. The nomination of Mr. Wells was a victory of that very sort. The election of the gold standard Democrat against the protest of the free silver ex-candidate will mean that a Democracy reorganized in this way stands a very fair chance of being a victorious Democracy. Mr. Bryan's opposition to the Democratic nominee will doubtless cost him many votes, perhaps enough to turn the scale against him. Mr. Wells and Mr. Parker both owe their nominations to the popular demand for reform, yet both are supported by unscrupulous machines which are stones of offense in the eyes of all decent citizens. The Republican machine, which controls the City Hall, is rank and smells to heaven; it is rich with dirty dollars. But it is answered that Parker is not Ziegenheim, and nobody denies it. The Democratic machine, the wires of which lead straight to the governor's office, controls the police department and the election and excise commissioners. But it is answered that Dockery is not Stephens, and that also is true—to a degree. It is a fact however that St. Louis suffers from lack of home rule as much as Ireland does. The city must pay for its police department, but the department is controlled by the governor's appointees. The city has ordinances regulating the saloons, but the governor's police and the governor's excise commissioner (the latter of which is beinning to do at least a fraction of his duty) can and do nullify these ordinances. The odium of this injustice Mr. Wells must bear in part—and undeservedly, withal—because his party is guilty. Truly, the situation was dubious enough before Mr. Bryan threw in another handful of interrogation points by launching against the candidate of his party the ball of political excommunication (ex cathedra redactoris) from his sanctum in Lincoln.

Home Rule in New York. New York is apparently threatened with an attack upon its home rule quite analogous to that which has already been successfully made upon St. Louis. The papers have heralded it as a rupture between Senator Platt and Gov. Odell, which may or may not be true, and is a feature of only secondary importance in any case. A bill putting the control of the New York City police in the hands of the state authorities is fathered by Mr. Platt. Gov. Odell says he will veto it if passed, and the governor is quite right. True, the present control by Tammany Hall is a combination of bribery, blackmail, and plain theft. Tammany ought to be choked, but the city must do it. Tammany is the dominant political organization of the dominant party in the city. Either the party must reform by making a more decent element of it dominant, or the city must reform by making some other party dominant. It can be set down as self-evident that Tammany can no more be reformed into decency than tar can be refined into rose-water. But in any case the city must have home rule. In Missouri, a Democratic legislature has robbed the state's normally Republican metropolis of its right of self-government for political purposes. In New York it is proposed to rob a normally Democratic city of home rule and place it under the control of a Republican legislature. The New York legislature may or may not be as bad as the last in Missouri, but in any case no permanent good can come of imposing upon the metropolis a system of extra-urban control of local affairs, which is fundamentally wrong.

Disfranchisement in Maryland. A bill has recently become a law in Maryland which will have for its effect the disfranchisement of nearly 50,000 voters. We have not yet seen a copy of the bill in full, but from the details which have been published, it seems to be a good measure. It recognizes no color line, but will disqualify illiterates generally by depriving them of the assistance of the election clerks in marking their ballots. It was claimed, and rightly, that this method destroyed the secrecy of the ballot. Of course it may be possible to drill illiterates so that they can recognize the names of one or two principal candidates when they see them, without adding materially to their qualifications for casting an intelligent ballot; but the step is right as far as it goes. The bill, which was passed by the Democrats, will have the immediate effect of disfranchising about 32,000 negroes and about 16,000 whites, of whom practically all of the former, and perhaps half of the latter, are Republicans. This will probably turn the balance of political power and put the state in the list of Democratic certainties. A legislature is to be elected next fall, and a United States Senator next year to succeed Mr. Wellington. If this shall bring Mr. Gorman out of his involuntary retirement, it will be a grievous event. But the principle of limiting the franchise to those who can read seems to us reasonable and just, when not accompanied by such a discriminating clause as that in the election law of South Carolina and some other states, which recognizes Caucasian ancestry as a satisfactory substitute for intelligence and education. It is said that a wave of enthusiasm over learning to read has started among the negroes of Maryland.

No Peace in South Africa. The peace negotiations between Gen. Kitchener and Gen. Botha have failed, and the war must drag on its dismal length a little longer. The terms which were offered to the Boers by Gen. Kitchener and Sir Alfred Milner, revised and limited by Mr. Chamberlain, have been made public. They are very generous terms to be offered by one who is almost a victor, and declined by one who is almost conquered by annihilation. Unconditional surrender was not asked. On the contrary, complete amnesty was granted, "qualified only by disfranchisement of British subjects implicated in the war;" the prisoners who have been deported to St. Helena, Ceylon, and elsewhere were to be brought back; civil administration should take the place of martial law at once, and a representative government should be established soon; the execution of the laws was to be intrusted to a high court independent of the executive; lands, church property, trusts and orphan funds were to be respected; the Dutch and English languages were to be on an equality in the schools and courts; Great Britain was not to assume the debts of the late republics, and was not to impose war taxes upon them, but, as an act of grace, a million pounds would be appropriated to pay the inhabitants for goods requisitioned by the Boer governments and forces during the war. Those who consider that Great Britain is wholly in the wrong in the present war would not, of course, be satisfied with anything less than a grant of independence and the payment of a war indemnity by Great Britain. But it is not to be expected that Great Britain would see it that way. The offer of terms as generous as these, practically guaranteeing before the cessation of hostilities a free and just government, shows to what straits British dignity has been reduced. Chamberlain no longer talks in a toplofty manner about the impossibility of compromising British prestige by offering terms to rebels. The less said about British prestige in connection with South Africa, the better. No one can blame England for offering as much as this, and it is hard to see how anyone could expect her to offer more. The rejection of the terms by the Boers is suicidal. It means that they have shut their eyes, clenched their teeth, and determined to fight to the bitter end. Incidentally, it may also mean that Great Britain must raise more revenue for war expenses by the sugar tax or by increasing the income tax.

The Chinese Puzzle. The deliberations of the ministers at Pekin on the matter of indemnity have been quite overshadowed, as an object of public interest, by the threatening complications for which Russia is responsible. The Tien Tsin episode brought England and Russia very nearly to blows over the trivial matter of a railroad siding, involving a dispute about the boundary of a railroad concession. The trouble apparently grew out of hotheadedness of the officers in charge on the spot. Great Britain has conceded the correctness of Russia's claim and has yielded. Various and conflicting reports are rife about Russia's gains in Manchuria. The most hopeful is that China, emboldened by the opposition of the Powers, has refused to ratify the terms made by her representative in St. Petersburg. England is not in a position to protest forcibly against the Russian occupation of Manchuria. Gen. Chaffee has been ordered to withdraw to Manila with the 2,000 American troops which remained in China after the removal of an equal number last fall, and by the end of April only a legation-guard of 150 will be left. Theoretically, only a legation-guard remains now, but that name seems scarcely suitable to a body of 2,000 soldiers commanded by a major general. This withdrawal, in spite of the unsettled relations among the Powers, seems to be an abandonment of any purpose which there may have been (as expressed in Secretay Hay's note last July) to use force "to preserve Chinese territorial and administrative entity." With Russia about to fasten her grip on an important province of China, it cannot be maintained that that object of preserving China's territorial integrity, has been accomplished. It must be believed, therefore, that the State Department is willing to give moral support to the effort to prevent dismemberment, but is not willing to use force to that end. Whatever may be Russia's intention as regards permanent occupation or absolute possession of Manchuria, there is no doubt but that her demands interfere with the "administrative" integrity of the Chinese empire. With England and the United States virtually out of it, the task of blocking Russia falls to Germany, whose present military operations along the Great Wall may be intended to have some such effect, or to Japan, who is always ready to take up a quarrel with Russia or anyone else who threatens Korea.

The Awakening of Korea. Twenty-five years ago Korea was born into the world of politics as an infant nation by opening diplomatic relations with Japan. Six years later treaties were made with European Powers, but Japan has always been jealous of her rights as the first who penetrated the barriers of the hermit kingdom. In the commercial and industrial development of Korea, Japanese influence was at first paramount, but western capital and brains have led in developing the mines and the railroads and steamship lines. The acceptance of these foreign influences gradually won Korea away from the suzerainty of China and brought practical independence which is now confirmed by a treaty to which Japan and Russia, the two live Powers which are in closest touch with Korea, are signatories. Indications have not been wanting of late that Russia contemplates encroachments in this direction. It is reported that the British director of Korean customs, whose position is analogous to that of Sir Robert Hart in China, has been displaced at the demand of a Russian and that an effort is being made to force Russians into all the offices which are held by foreigners. If this policy is persisted in, there will be trouble. The completion of the Siberian railway will make Korea a highly convenient possession for Russia and will bring it almost as near to the Russian as to the Japanese capital, so far as military effectiveness is concerned; but Japan is too firmly settled in the idea of keeping Russia out of Korea and too confident of her own strength to let the matter go without a fight.

Brevities. It is believed that a gift of five million dollars by Mr. Carnegie for public libraries in Philadelphia will be formally announced in a few days.

A convict rebellion in the coal mines operated by the Kansas penitentiary led to the capture of fifteen guards at the bottom of the shaft by about three hundred convicts, and was suppressed by a daring descent of the officials into the shaft.

Russia is having success abroad but trouble at home. The students' riot at the Kazan Cathedral in St. Petersburg, on the anniversary of the freeing of the serfs, March 5, has been followed by such widespread disorders that special measures have been taken to preserve the peace.

Can a choir singer, who has deserted the church choir for the vaudeville stage, recover damages from a preacher who criticizes her action in a sermon? A case of this sort is being tried in Brooklyn. The plaintiff alleges injury to her feelings and reputation to the extent of $20,000.

A combination of the Illinois coal operators is said to be pending, similar to that which controls 95 per cent. of the output in the Pittsburg district. The mines which may combine in Illinois have an annual production of about thirty million tons, employ forty thousand men and will have a capitalization of about $75,000,000.

Even the soberest of journals can revel in the luxury of an occasional "scoop." The London "Times," the synonym for journalistic gravity and decorum, recently printed the items of King Edward's new "civil list" before they were officially announced. By way of punishment it has been proposed to exclude its reporters from the House of Commons for one week.

State Senator Harrel, of Kentucky, a former supporter of Gov. Beckham, claims to have proof that the governor formed an agreement with the Louisville gamblers and criminals before he was elected, according to which he was to make free use of his pardoning power in exchange for their support in the campaign. Harrel says he will impeach the governor when the senate convenes.

An anti-gambling law which has recently been passed by the Arkansas legislature embodies some of the most stringent provisions ever included in a measure of the sort. It provides for a fine of not less than $500 for any person conducting any sort of a gambling scheme or owning any gambling device, or for the owner of any building in which gambling is carried on,or for any prosecuting attorney, city attorney or mayor who, knowing the existence of any violation of this law, shall fail to prosecute.

Breathes there a St. Louis citizen with soul so dead that he does not know just where the site of the World's Fair should be and why? We have not seen him. Mass meetings are being held to stimulate sentiment in favor of various suggested sites. The selfish motive of the enthusiasts usually shows through. But this is not a question to be settled by enthusiasm. The question is not what part of the city will be most benefited by getting the Fair, but what location will be most favorable to the success of the enterprise. Let the local enthusiasts imitate the discreet and laconic clam, and give the experts a chance to decide without throwing into their eyes so much of the dust of selfish prejudice.

Is the Church of To-day Righteous?

The church has this task before it—to convince itself and the world of the reality and possibility, the impelling force and self-evincing power, of righteousness. The church in its ideal character is God's organized remonstrance against wickedness, and his divinely elected witness for righteousness. It is the pillar and ground of the truth in the sense of being an incarnation of a divine element in humanity, the monumental witness of the reality and saving virtue of the regenerate life in the world.

In relation to the practicableness of goodness, as thus ideally and potentially represented by the church, there are four classes of persons with which we have to deal.

1. Those who believe in wickedness and denounce the profession of righteousness as hypocrisy. This class is numerous in the haunts of iniquity, and may as well at the beginning be rubbed off the slate as beyond redemption.

2. Those who profess a general belief in righteousness, but think there is very little of it, and that wickedness is a kind of necessity—by way of adding spice and piquancy to life. This world, they tell us, would be an intolerable monotone, and horribly dull, if there were no deviltry in it. Good people are tiresome, piety is a bore, moral earnestness is fanaticism, holiness is effeminate, tame, undramatic, destitute of exciting and blood-tingling diversification of interests. In the popular novel the villain of the story runs ahead of the hero in dramatic interest, the escapades of the bad and the moral lapses of the good sustain the nerve thrills of fiction. This half-human animal, not by any means without good impulses, glances up occasionally toward the higher regions of life and pities the people up there for the "fun" they are missing below. To regenerate this type of animal humanity is a matter of extreme difficulty.

3. Another class think righteousness a good thing for other people, but hardly intended for them, or possible to them. There are plenty of people in this lopsided world of ours who preach righteousness and strenuously advocate goodness, but do not seem to think it at all incumbent as a personal obligation on them to practice it. There is a great deal of theoretic and dogmatic righteousness that succeeds but poorly in getting itself translated into life. Abstract and creedal righteousness is rife in theology, but scarce in manhood. Napoleon expressed the opinion that religion and morality were good things for other people, but being a man apart and a law to himself, these fundamental principles of life and salvation did not apply to him. Unhappily this species of moral Napoleonism is not uncommon in all the communions of Christendom, not to mention the world outside.

4. We must not forget to mention the remnant of those, small in comparison, it may be, who exemplify in their lives the truth and wisdom of John's doctrine, "He that doeth righteousness is righteous," who have demonstrated in experience and in consciousness the reality and superiority of righteousness.

It is the function of the church to demonstrate in life and practice that righteousness is completely and triumphantly possible, and to compel the admission, if not the conviction, that nothing else will do. The unregenerate world has first to deal with the church, which is the only visible manifestation of Christ and his truth of which it has any knowledge, and hence the way the church behaves itself in its daily walk and conversation determines the disposition that the world will make of Christ and the cause he represents. If the church misrepresents Christ by bad behavior and a loose sense of righteousness, the world will reject him on the ground of this misrepresentation.

The moral character of the church determines the disposition that the world will make of Christ, for it knows enough of righteousness to demand it in those who profess it. As Christ represents our glorified humanity in heaven, we are to represent his divinity on earth, and hence, if we misbehave ourselves in the house of God, we misrepresent his divinity, the pillars break, the ground crumbles, and this incomparable truth on which the salvation of the world depends is exposed to contempt and rejection. When the righteousness of Christ appears in the lives of his people the genuine article will staunch criticism, carry conviction, and commend itself to every man's conscience in the sight of God. A righteous church vindicates Christ, demonstrates his divine Saviorhood, and commends the truth by its consistent life to the world's acceptance.

A fundamental need is righteousness in the religion of to-day; civic, municipal, social, as well as personal, righteousness. If it be true that the ultimate test of reality is persistence, it is a potent fact that the unrighteousness against which the church has to contend is tremendously real, while the ethical impulse of the church is short-winded and comparatively feeble. Our zeal for moral reform is intermittent and spasmodic. We have our spasms of virtue, but they do not last. The minions of Satan, reckoning on shortness of wind in the representatives of righteousness, wink at each other and wait. Inspired by selfishness their activity is ceaseless, except when they are waiting for a spell for the storm of righteous indignation to blow over, or retire behind the hill to re-form their lines for a fresh and more vigorous attack. Recently there was a primary election not a thousand miles from where these lines are written. Conservative men pronounce it to have been the most disgraceful contest they have ever known in a section of country not celebrated for incorruption in politics. Corruption funds were administered by saloonkeepers, and hundreds of men were so drunk they could not vote without assistance. A few days before this sacred concert of electoral American citizenship an effort was made to get a law and order league together, composed of Christian men, to stem the tide of scoundrelism that was setting in, and to close the saloons on Sunday, that for years had been running in open defiance of law and decency. Only two men materialized, although this was the second attempt to get the League together. The grand jury was dispersed, the League is comatose or in the sixth degree of hypnotic slumber, and the devil is getting in his work as usual. This may not be a representative instance of short-winded righteousness and long-winded unrighteousness, but it is not an uncommon condition of things, as the reader well knows. What is the use to observe sacraments, preach dogmas, and go through with forms of public worship if we are going to wade through environing corruption neck-deep without a protest strong enough to be heard and felt? We can do with less theology and with much less ecclesiastical narrowness and prejudice, if we could only get in exchange for them a little more persistence in practical righteousness. A righteousness—defending and propagating church is the need of the hour.

Notes and Comments.

Those who have been looking in vain for a clear, concise and authoritative statement of what Christian Science really is, expressed in crisp Anglo-Saxon, will seize with joy upon the following, which are the words of one of its leading exponents: "Christian Science through its interpretation of the being of the motherhood and fatherhood of the divine Us, alias God, thereby reveals the real nature of man and woman. It also reveals the lesser manifestations of the divine nature in what is known as masculine and feminine identity in universal creation. Thus it introduces the inductive process of spiritual rationality." "The divine Us!" There you have it in a nutshell. Some other parts of the statement may not be quite so luminous—such, for instance, as "the inductive process of spiritual rationality"—but more of the gist of the science was never put into four words than in the "divine Us, alias God." It would not, perhaps, shock the followers of Mother Eddy very seriously to hear from her lips, "the divine Me, alias God."

The discontinuance of the "New World," the ablest liberal theological magazine in this country, some weeks ago, has been made the occasion of some doleful jeremiads over the decline of religious journalism, the waning interest in denominational papers and the loss of prestige by the theological reviews. There is some truth in the cry, but more error. The fact is that there is a waning of interest in those publications which represent a narrow conception of religion. By narrowness we do not mean theological conservatism—for the most liberal theology is often connected with the narrowest view of religion—but we mean a conception of religion which separates it from the other interests of men and makes it a section of life rather than a way of living and a way of viewing all life. There never was a time when religious papers so thoroughly reflected the world's life and thought as at the present day, and those religious journals which, realizing that religion has to do with the whole man, do not confine their attention to theological questions and reports of evangelistic work, but have something to say also of education, of literature, of art, of moral and civic reforms, of national policies—in short all the world-wide interests of men—these religious journals are suffering no decline.

The municipal campaign in St. Louis is developing a large amount of criticism of each party's machine by the other.

It is a case of the "pot calling the kettle black," whichever way you take it. But that always seemed to us a foolish proverb. What if it was the sooty pot which uttered this criticism upon the complexion of the kettle? That didn't keep it from being true. For anything we know to the contrary, the kettle was black, and the still greater griminess of its critic did not make the observation less true than if it had been made by a cut-glass vase. It is a wise kettle that can see the truth of an accusation even when made by the pot, and the party machines in St. Louis would show great wisdom if each would profit by the other's criticism without pausing to determine which of the two is worse.

An account of inauguration day in Washington comments upon the fact that there was not "a saloon or low dive in the city which was not decorated profusely with bunting, flags, banners, and photographs of the Methodist President," while "there was not a church in all Washington decorated with so much as a five-cent flag." Perhaps that partially explains why the crowd went to the saloons that night. After an inauguration the public naturally wants to go where there are visible tokens of patriotism, and thousands of foolish and misguided fellows thought the flags in the saloons were evidences of patriotic enthusiasm. Perhaps it would not have been a bad idea if the churches had kept open house and displayed a little bunting. They could have explained, if they liked, that it was not done in approval of the "Methodists' President," and it might have kept a good many out of the saloons. The church has no right to allow the saloons to monopolize the flag on such an occasion.

Hour of Prayer.

Wells in the Desert *

TEXT: And they came to Elim, where were twelve springs of water, and three score and ten palm trees: and they encamped there by the waters.—Ex. 15:27.

No wonder they camped there; for these Hebrew pilgrims had been traveling for days without water. How true is the old saying, "The worth of a thing is best known by the want of it." We take our blessings as a matter of course; not only do we want food and drink daily, but some of us want them served in silver!

Thirsty Pilgrims.

Read the verses immediately preceding the text and you will find that for three days the pilgrims had found no water; that they murmured against Moses. Their fretting did not slake their thirst, but rather increased it. Just before entering the wilderness, they had stood in triumph on the banks of the Red Sea, miraculously delivered! And now three days' travel in the desert is enough to change the song of Miriam into jarring discord. As if to taunt them, they find bitter waters at Marah. But just as their anger and disgust reach a climax, Moses cries unto the Lord and the bitter waters are made sweet. It was after such a trying experience that "they came to Elim"; how grateful the shade of the palm trees and the twelve springs of water! Children of God to-day travel through waterless wastes; the drought consumes them. Blessed are they who find their spiritual Elim and are wise enough to encamp there.

*Prayer-meeting topic for April 3.

Rivers of Water.

"And a man shall be . . . as rivers of water in a dry place" (Isa. 32:2). God is never a niggard. He gives with a full hand from exhaustless reservoirs. Living springs and flowing rivers are the fit symbols of His plenitude. Water, so necessary and so universal, represents His grace. From snowy summits and craggy canons He sends the crystal streams through the valleys, and they smile with golden harvests. But the upper air is likewise full of rivers. Tons of water are carried by the coursing winds over our heads, "rivers of water" indeed! What a stimulus to our faith and what an encouragement to prayer is all this abundance. And yet there are moments of weariness and hot discouragement when it will scarcely silence our complaints! "A man shall be as rivers of water"; what man can fulfill this brilliant prophecy? What soul is great enough to refresh the famished nations as the rivers the dry soil? Herder, dying, said eagerly, "Can you not give me a great thought to refresh me?" Only one in whom the Spirit of God is can meet the requirements; and who is He, except the Son of God? The soul that drinks of the water that He gives never thirsts again.

Blooming Deserts.

Gardens bloom and meadows shine like a starry firmament, but who ever heard of a blooming desert? It is a contradiction of terms. It is a transformation, wrought by the Spirit and power of God; that which was desert and drear becomes fertile and harvests wave where nothing grew before. "The desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose." Such are the transformations of grace. Sinners become saints and cannibals become Christians.

What Christian does not at times pass through the desert? One day follows another without water, without cheer, without companionship or sympathy. The consolations of God grow small, the heart grows faint. To every famine-smitten, desert-wandering soul comes the promise of fragrance and fruit, not when the desert is passed, but in the barren desert itself.

From Strength to Strength.

"They go from strength to strength.
Every one of them appeareth before God in Zion (Ps. 84:7).

It is an inestimable gain to be refseshed when we have been weary. What sleep is to the toiler, what food is to the hungry, or water to the thirsty, that and more than that is God in Christ to them who seek Him. Take some time, then, to be alone. Call halt to the bustling procession of daily care. Seek for your Elim, and camp there. Regale yourself on the fruit of the palm trees and refresh your spirit with deep draughts of the flowing springs. But not only are you rested, you are also strengthened beyond your former strength, for the promise is, "from strength to strength," from one degree of energy to another. Think of it—instead of being tired, lagging wanderers in the desert, we may be mighty men of valor.

"Thou Breath from still eternity,
Breathe o'er my spirit's barren land—
The pine-tree and the myrtle-tree
Shall spring amidst the desert sand,
And where Thy living water flows,
The waste shall blossom as the rose."

Prayer.

We remember, O God, the deliverances thou hast wrought in our past; how Thou didst sweeten the bitter waters and lead us from hot sands to gushing fountains. May we cherish these memories and go on to greater benedictions and greater strength, coming to the living Fountain, the source of the river by whose verdant banks we have traveled, in Christ the Lord. Amen.

Editor's Easy Chair.

Long will the memory of those bright, sunny days spent on Biscayne Bay survive in our mind. Forever remembered will be the strong and tender manifestations of friendship and hospitality we enjoyed in the pleasant home of Capt. and Mrs. Haden during the ten days of our sojourn there. Enduring as life is the photograph we shall carry in our mind of the scene spread out before us from their eastern veranda when the afternoon sun painted its variegated colors on the bay, lighting up with a halo of glory the mangrove forest which forms the shoreline of Biscayne Key in the distance, and causes the old lighthouse on Cape Florida—the southern extremity of Key Biscayne—to shine like a white needle piercing the horizon far to the southeast. Nor shall we soon forget that splendid sail to Cape Florida and return, one breezy day, when the little catboat "Sonia" flew as on the wings of the wind. When the trolling hook, following far behind in the foaming billows, was taken by a large Spanish mackerel, which sought to resist its capture, the reader can imagine the excitement of the moment. Unequal contest! An experienced fisherman, who has angled at Macatawa, soon landed him sprawling on the deck of the flying craft, a spotted beauty, and a joy when served up that evening at supper by the skilled cookery of Mrs. H. This invader from Spain proved to be the forerunner of three others, to which the master of our vessel could give no better name than "runners"—and runners they must have been to have pursued and overtaken the bait drawn through the water at the speed we were going. But we were told this is about the only way to capture these game fish. One huge member of the finny tribe—perhaps a king fish—took the hook and snapped the line as if it had been a mere thread. "The biggest one got away."

But let us return to Cape Florida, as the southern end of Key Biscayne is called. A Mr. Davis owns a splendid plantation covering this end of the key, filled with more kinds of tropical trees, shrubs, fruits and flowers than we ever saw before in the same space. The house, with its broad, hospitable-looking verandas, is unoccupied, and two colored men, who were in charge of the plantation, seemed to be the sole occupants of the island or key. The old lighthouse, which is so called to designate it from the new one on another key, which is now in use, is the scene of some history of a stirring character. The wooden part of its inner stairway is burned, and it presents a smoked and battered appearance. During the Seminole war the Indians got possession of the cape and sought to capture the lighthouse keeper, who, in his airy fortress at the top, resisted their attack. They tried to burn and moke him out, but he held out until they were compelled to leave, when he was rescued from his perilous position. This is one of the chain of keys which stretch from Virginia Key north of it to Key West. The line of steamers from Miami to Key West and Cuba pass inside this line of keys, and are thus protected from the waves with which in stormy weather they would have to contend. We would greatly have enjoyed a sail to Cuba or Porto Rico, but our limited time made this impracticable. The nearest we came to this was to go down to the wharf and go through and inspect one of the steamers of the Peninsular and Occidental line. At some future time we hope to visit the young republic of the Antilles from this port.

It is only truth to say that we have formed a much higher estimate of southern or tropical Florida than we had previously held. The greater immunity from frosts and freezes which it enjoys, the healthfulness of the climate, the variety of tropical fruits and vegetables it produces, the beautiful Bay of Biscayne, exerting a modifying influence on the temperature and furnishing a continual feast to the lover of water views, and the sports of sailing, rowing or fishing, and we might add, the excellent character of the people who live in the neighborhood of Cocoanut Grove, all combine to make it a very desirable part of the state in which to live, or to spend the winter months. Kirk Munroe, author of "Through Swamp and Glade," and many other popular volumes, whose accomplished wife is the daughter of the well-known author, Amelia Barr, lives in a lovely home overlooking the bay. This family and several others whom we had the privilege of meeting, showed us courtesy and kindness. The library and the Biscayne Yacht Club, with Commodore Munroe in charge, where we had access to the daily papers, offered their privileges to us freely. On our last day in that section we had the pleasure of visiting the Dade county fair, held in Miami. It was, in the main, an exposition of what could be produced in the county in the way of fruits and vegetables of every description. As fine potatoes—both sweet and Irish—as we ever saw were exhibited. But the tropical fruits—lemons, limes, grape fruit, oranges, guavas, tropical papaws, bananas—abounded, and they were of superior quality. The premium on grape fruit and king oranges was taken by some young men who, frozen out further north in the state, came into this section and tried again and have demonstrated what pluck, energy, and hard work intelligently directed can accomplish in this soil and climate. We visited their place—"Devil Den's Farm"—and photographed a specimen grape fruit tree, bending down with the golden fruit. When Miami gets deep water through Norris Cut, between the keys, and a basin inside for a harbor, which it ought to have and must have in the future, it is bound to be a thriving and important seaport city, and Cocoanut Grove will be its most select and popular suburb. But we have now bid adieu to these pleasant scenes and associations for the present, and are making our way northward to Lexington and our national Congress.

Is it not the worst form of atheism to assert the real existence of evils such as disease which are to be cured not by an appeal to God but by an appeal to drugs? S. & H.

Is it not a more insidious form of atheism to assume that the healing elements which are found in nature were not placed there in accordance with God's plans? Suppose I am in a wilderness and have need of shelter from the storm. Shall I denounce the rain as an evil phantom of the mortal mind and appeal to God to keep me dry from its fancied wetness, or shall I use the strength which God has put into my arms to build me a shelter to keep off the rain? If, in that wilderness, I am attacked by fever, shall I rely solely upon prayer, to the exclusion of those remedies which the Creator has caused to grow in that very wilderness, or shall I use the means which he has given me to help myself?

Washing the disciples' feet is found in the law of Christ and hence becomes a part of the law of Christ, and the law is an ordinance and remains such until abrogated. Neither Christ nor the apostles ever abrogated it, hence it remains in the church as an ordinance thereof and as such should be observed by the Disciples. Is not this correct? Mathetes.

If it were true that the command to wash the disciples' feet was found in the law of Christ, it would doubtless be permanently binding as an institution in the church. Christ spoke many things which were not permanent commands to be obeyed literally, but were expressions of eternal truths and principles in forms suitable to the times in which they were spoken. The apostles evidently did not understand that the washing of one another's feet was meant by our Lord to be an ordinance in the church. They did understand that baptism and the Lord's supper were so intended, for it is recorded that they practiced these ordinances. Certainly the apostles, who, besides their special inspiration, had the advantage of an intimate personal acquaintance with Jesus, were in the best position to know his meaning on this matter.

Are we not drifting toward clericalism, with our college-bred and graduated ministers? Do we not need a revival of Alexander Campbell's denunciation of the clergy to save us from the error of making a gulf between the clergy and the laity? Laicus.

No, we do not need a revival of Mr. Campbell's denunciation of the clergy. Still less do we need to sound a warning against "college-bred and graduated ministers." The tendency of the church at the present time, happily, is against clericalism and nothing helps to break down the false distinction between clergy and laity more than broad and deep ministerial education. The tendency at present is against conceiving of the minister as a priest, even in the slightest degree or the faintest sense, and rather toward making him a man of practical affairs, whose duty it is to be an efficient leader in all moral, social and civic reforms. The ministry is much more in danger of being unduly secularized than of being set apart on a pedestal by itself according to the old priestly conception. The cry for a renewed denunciation of clericalism, to be accompanied by a lowering of the standard of ministerial education, is a sheer anachronism and exhibits a failure to grasp the spirit and tendencies of our time.

What is the strongest evidence of the truth of Christianity? G. G.

With wise adaptation to the differences of different minds, there have been provided many evidences of the truth of the Christian religion. Some dwell with delight upon the relation between type and antitype, and find their strongest testimony in the fulfillment of prophecy. Some believe in Jesus because of the miracles, while some believe the record of the miracles because they believe in the character and claims of Jesus. Among the evidences of Christianity which appeal to us most strongly are these two: First, it produced a body of literature which stands as an effect without an adequate cause, unless Christianity was a divine revelation. The Book exists as a fact which must be explained. Its existence is more marvelous if it is false than if it is true. Second, Christianity, as embodied in the life and teaching of Christ, recorded in the New Testament and imperfectly reflected in the lives of his followers, is a power to uplift and inspire. It finds man and finds him at his highest point. The old proverb, "Too good to be true," is essentially false, because based on a pessimistic conception of the world. What is good enough is always true, and Christianity is too good to be false. For a profound and eloquent exposition of this principle, that man's highest aspirations always point to truth, read Browning's poem "Abt Vogler."

1. If we conscientiously believe that faith, repentance and baptism are necessary to be initiated into the kingdom of Christ, can we from a strict scriptural standpoint commune and fellowship with Pedobaptists?

2. Is the Lord's supper for Christians only?

3. If baptism is a burial, in what respect is a person dead before he is baptized, for only the dead are to be buried. If dead to sin, are his sins not forgiven? Inquirer.

1. This question has often been asked and answered in these columns. We can consistently commune with Pedobaptists because, since our Lord has given us authority only for each man to examine himself, our communing with them involves no approval of what we consider to be their error in regard to the command of baptism. We can have fellowship with them, i. e., treat them as Christian brethren, because we recognize their Christian character. Neither of these attitudes is inconsistent with the most strictly scriptural standpoint and neither of them surrenders our position in regard to faith, repentance and baptism.

2. Probably no one who does not consider himself a Christian will care to partake of the Lord's supper. It is an institution in memory of Christ's death and was intended to be observed by all of his followers, i. e., by all who wish to remember Him. The fact that a sincere follower of Christ misinterprets (as we believe) one of his ordinances is no reason why he should be excluded from the other.

3. Is it not legitimate to say that one becomes dead to sin when he repents of his past sins, having faith in the power of Christ to save him from sin? One who is not to this degree already dead to sin has no right to be baptized. The expression "dead to sin" is a statement of the case on its human side—the attitude which man must occupy toward his sins. The expression "forgiveness of sins" or "remission of sins" states the case from the divine side—the attitude which God takes toward the man who has fulfilled certain conditions. The two are not the same.

THE PHILIPPINES: The Land and the People

By LESLIE U. COLLINS, Comp. B, 6th U. S. Infantry

There are more than thirteen hundred islands in the Philippine archipelago. Sixty-nine different languages are spoken by the natives. Where I am stationed at present, on the island of Negros, the language is a conglomeration of low Filipino and bad Spanish. A limited knowledge of Latin enables one to note the difference at once.

Before the wily and wicked Spaniards came to this island (and that was a very long time ago) the dusky natives had neither guns nor shoes—very few have now, only the better class—therefore there were no words in their language for these articles. When shoes and guns were introduced by the Spaniards the natives readily adopted the Spanish words, "frizelle" and "topotoes," the Spanish words for guns and shoes, and they were soon incorporated into the Filipino language; and in this way many other Spanish words have found their way into the native tongue. Were I to say "Good-morning" in Filipino, I could do so without employing a Spanish word. It is expressed as follows: "My-ohn-anja," and this is pure, unmixed Filipino. But were I to say, "It is a bad morning," I would be obliged to call upon the Spanish language to help me out, for there is no word in the Filipino dialect for "bad." I do not suppose the natives were all good before the Spanish came; but certainly their coming did not materially improve their social, intellectual or moral condition. If there were bad ones here before the Spanish came it was evidently a case of "ignorance is bliss," where it is folly to be wise, for they were bad and didn't know it; or if they knew it, they were powerless to tell it, for they had no word for "bad" in their vocabulary.

Whether they had any "bad words" in their language or not I am unable to say. I am not well enough versed in Filipino to determine. The Spanish word for "bad" is "malo," hence "bad morning" would have to be expressed thus, "malo-anja," which is a mixture of Filipino and Spanish. And so the Filipino, whether he lives on the large island of Luzon, with its low swamps and numerous lakes, or upon the evergreen clad shores of beautiful Panay and Negros, has a heterogeneous language compounded of questionable Filipino and villainous Spanish. Moreover, this conglomerate dialect is not difficult to learn.

I am writing this letter from Bacolod, the capital of the beautiful island of Negros, one of the largest and wealthiest of the southern group. Bacolod is a very attractive native town of several thousand inhabitants. It is almost entirely surrounded by a beautiful cocoanut grove, which extends into both the northern and southern suburbs of the city; while smoking volcanoes and towering mountains, some thirty miles to the west, look frowningly down upon this quiet little island city. To the east the blue waters of the ever restless sea stretch away in measureless distance. There are no docks of any description anywhere in the Philippine Islands, and on this account landing from large vessels is always attended with difficulty, and sometimes, when the sea is rough, with danger. Along the shores of Negros the sea is very shallow for a considerable distance, and large boats cannot approach nearer than four miles to the shore. This shallow water is often lashed into fury, and it requires but a slight wind to set it foaming. During twilight hours I love to wander up and down the even, sandy, shell-lined beach, and gaze in silent, reverential thought across the blue, rolling waves to the indistinct shore-line of beautiful Panay where, embowered in luxuriant tropical foliage, lies the fascinating city of Iloilo, pronounced Ee-lee-wee-lo. My stay of one week in the charming city of Iloilo will ever be remembered as a pleasant dream. It seemed like a new world; the luxuriant tropical verdure, the wealth of sweetly perfumed and variegated flowers, the strange and gaily plumaged birds, the curious inhabitants, with their incomprehensible language—all conspired to make it seem like another world to me.

But of all the cities of the Philippine Islands—and there are many—there are none to be compared with beautiful, charming Manila—the capital of Luzon. No matter whether bathed in the splendor and sunshine of a bright, tropical day, or partially hidden by the charitable light of a brilliant moon, or calm and silent at midnight, she is always beautiful. Having once seen this charming tropical city, the mind is forever stamped with a fascinating picture that it is impossible to forget. The Pasig river divides the city. On the right is old Manila, the walled city of long ago with its quaint architecture. It is thoroughly Spanish. On the left is the new Manila with her more modern buildings and her truly escolota street. The bridge of Spain crosses the river and thus the two cities are united into one municipality. There is something about it that is strikingly suggestive of Venice.

Negros is supposed to be the second wealthiest island of the southern group, Panay being first in point of wealth and natural resources. Bacolod is situated near the ocean beach and enjoys the everlasting murmur of the sea. There is something grand and sublime in an ocean scene. It is said there are no skeptics among those who "go down to the sea in ships." Sailors may be superstitious, but they are not unbelieving. The proofs of the might and majesty of God are about them on every hand, and in the howl of the storm and the shrieking of the winds, and in the low and melancholy moan of the ocean, as she sighs and sobs, they hear the ever audible voice of the Infinite.

We have just passed through our rainy season, which is our winter here in the tropics, and how wonderfully bright and fresh the wealth of tropical foliage appears! Flowers in great abundance and of every variety and of brilliant colors bloom continually, and birds of gorgeous plumage and of all sizes and of strange forms never tire of singing.

There are very few Spanish on the island of Negros and almost none in this beautiful town of Bacolod. The native Filipinos cherish the most intense hatred for all Spaniards, and they made it so uncomfortable for them that they got out of the island. Perhaps their absence may account in part for its present quiet and peaceful condition.

I have found the educated Filipino a gentleman in every sense of the word. He is polite, accommodating, and always pleasant, and this class is rapidly coming to understand American civilization, and to look with favor upon American occupation of the islands. When the American government first landed troops on Negros, the Catholic friars told the people that Americans wore feathers in their hats and had an appetite for babies. The poor misguided and illiterate natives thought we would murder them and devour their babies; and even yet there are localities where these same ideas are still held by the ignorant natives. Is it any wonder they resisted with vigor and determination the occupation of the island by the Americans?

This reminds me of an amusing incident which happened in the early part of the war in Luzon. An American officer was captured by some rural Filipinos, and carried into the interior. They at once asked him where his feathers were, and also if he was hungry. If he answered in the affirmative, I suppose they were intending to get all their babies out of the way and beyond his reach. The uneducated Filipino is of a very curious and inquisitive turn of mind. He is a living interrogation point. He is never backward about seeking information. When he can't ask questions with words, he employs signs and gestures. They are especially gifted in natural language.

There are two things about my personal appearance which have given me great favor with the belles of Negros. First, I have two front teeth which are principally gold. They are rather conspicuous when I laugh, and as I am frequently obliged to indulge in that sort of healthful exercise, my gold incisors are frequently put on free exhibition, much to the admiration and amusement of the Filipino maidens and matrons.

The other thing is my luxuriant beard which I wear full, but well trimmed. The Filipinos have no beard. I am truly glad there is something about me that commends me to their favorable notice and admiration, even though part of it be artificial. But my beard which attracts the Filipino maidens frightens the monkeys, and they flee from me in terror.

The higher class of Filipinos dress plainly but neatly. The men generally wear entire white suits from shoes to hat. The women bedeck themselves with gorgeous colors, with brilliant purple and bright red predominating. On Sundays they array their sable forms in the most fantastic styles imaginable, and the make-up of the poorer class is laughable in the extreme. These are the things which often cause me to place my gold teeth on exhibition.

I have seen little boys kicking large rocks with their bare feet, while playing some sort of native game similar to American football. They seemed to enjoy the sport and their toes were apparently none the worse for it.

If there is any one thing a native Filipino dislikes more than anything else, it is to get his head wet. When out in the rain if he can keep his hair dry, he is all right. His scanty clothing may be drenched and soaked, but if his hair is dry, he feels he has successfully escaped the storms. They all take great pains with their hair, and their usual hair dressing is cocoanut oil, which they use frequently and abundantly and which seems to be excellent for the purpose, not only for Filipinos, but for Americans as well.

The well-to-do Filipinos all carry umbrellas when it rains, but the poorer class use simply a large banana leaf. It is an amusing sight to see a half naked Filipino strolling down the street in the rain with a large banana leaf for an umbrella. There is a certain Edenic simplicity and primitiveness about it.

What Most Interests Me Now

By J. S. LAMAR

VI. Providence.

I come now to consider a subject which, in one aspect at least, must be more entertaining: it is practical; it is connected with our varied experiences, and our daily personal conduct. In trying to understand as best we could the thoughts and ways of God in creating the world, we had to go back into the deep mysteries of the eternal past—to note the signs of his presence and the character of his acts, and to learn from these what seemed to be the immediate ends and ultimate object of them all. In a region so encompassed with darkness, I may easily have missed the right road, and failed to reach the correct conclusion. But the same should be thought of every human view of the creative process and work. Of each of them it may only be said that it is more or less plausible or probable, that it seems to be more or less strongly supported by objective facts and sound reasoning, and with this we must be content. At last, when the fullness of light shall be turned on, it will possibly be seen that all our thoughts have been imperfect at least, if not erroneous: that His thoughts are not our thoughts, neither are our ways His ways.

But whether creation was effected by the inherent force and spontaneous operation of law; or by means of law used as an instrument in the hands of a Personal Power; or, finally, by the immediate action of the all-powerful Will of the Infinite Mind, exerted at successive periods according to His own Wisdom and Purpose—in any case, the work is done; the world was made; and man is here, its lord and ruler. The eternal past comes into time, bringing its glorious achievements; the creative work gives place to providential care, oversight and government. If we are to recognize God when he comes to us, veiled at once and manifested in human flesh, it is certainly important for us to know the marks and signs of his divinity. Some of these tokens have been seen, it is hoped, in the preceding chapters, and may appear in even greater clearness in those which are to follow. In the former I attempted to indicate the infinite loftiness of His thoughts and His ways, His eternal purpose and His corresponding works; in the latter, I shall aim more especially to show how these contrast with those of men. The passage already partially given, Isaiah 55: 8, 9, as it will probably lead and color most of the thoughts which I shall yet wish to present, should be quoted here in full:

"For my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts."

This language seems to me to declare, not simply a difference, but an incomparable difference; a difference expressed by the distance between the heavens and the earth—a contrast. And nowhere, perhaps, is this more clearly seen than in the providential ordering of the world. Very few of us are entirely satisfied with this. To-be-sure, when we take a broad view and embrace an extended period of time, we are able to understand that the great overruling and directing Power has done all things wisely and well, but when it comes home to us or those very near to us, either in a punitive or disciplinary way, the case is apt to be different. We see so clearly what is immediately before our eyes—the suffering, the affliction, the destitution, the heartache, the fruitless toil, the overwhelming calamity—manifest evils, all of them—that, although we may not say so in words, we do experience a feeling in our hearts that things might be better regulated. Perhaps we do not formulate our thoughts into any very definite conclusion, but substantially they probably amount to about this: that if we had the unquestionable right and power to do so, we should certainly make very great changes in the administration of the world's affairs. For instance, yonder lives a feeble little woman in a humble cottage on a small farm. She is a widow, poor, pious and patient, with six little children dependent upon her for bread. With all her industry and economy, it is a hard, hard struggle barely to get a support. A few miles away in the city lives a speculator who is cold, selfish and proud, who neither fears God nor regards men, and his coffers are filled with millions of money for which he has no earthly use. I do not know how my readers may feel about it, but I am disposed to think that if I had had full control of all forces and influences, I should have managed to divert some of the money that was moving towards the speculator, and directed it into the hands of the widow.

After a while the woman plants her few acres in corn, and cultivates the growing crop with her own hands. It looks promising, and grows up so finely that her heart is cheered with the prospect of having plenty of bread for the coming winter. Just then the long drought sets in and continues week after week, while with fear and trembling she contemplates the brazen sky, and notes the effect of the burning sun as she sees her beautiful corn withering, twisting, drying, dying—her crop is lost and her hopes are dead. And now as she sits in her cheerless home, and looks into the faces of her darling children, with tears in her eyes and dark forebodings in her heart—the speculator has just applied the relentless screws to his hapless victims, which closes his deal, and he rakes in millions more.

It is needless to say that the poor widow had no control over the elements. She could neither bring the rain nor keep it off. She simply did her duty. She planted and labored in faith—hoping and trusting in God. And it was God that withheld the rain! So it is in all the world, and so it has always been. Everywhere we see brightness, joy, prosperity, hopefulness; but everywhere also we find distresses, poverty, calamities, famines, pestilences, anxieties and sorrows. Whether we like it or not, it is so. Whether we can explain it satisfactorily or not, still it is God's way, and we gain nothing by kicking against it. The only proper thing for us to do is humbly to acquiesce in it and try to understand it. The effort will come far short of perfection, but even a little light here will be encouraging. We may learn, at least:

1. That God's ways are not our ways. We would gladly banish suffering and affliction from the world, if we could; He could, but will not do it. So His thought is not ours.

2. He has a use for the evils that afflict humanity. They fill some important place in His plans and purposes.

3. That His thoughts are higher than our thoughts. We think of the immediate results; He of those which are consequential and ultimate. We think of present enjoyment; He of permanent character. We think we are at home; He that we are in a training school. We connect everything with the earthly life; He with the higher life.

And so, though we can see but dimly, we can see that His thoughts and ways are higher and better than ours; that under His wise and gracious oversight and control, all things are working together for our highest good. As individuals, the mysterious providences of the Lord are admirably and mercifully designed to develop and strengthen in us the passive virtues—patience, humble trust, even in the darkness, resignation, uncomplaining submission to the Father's will, and the confident loooking to the outworking of all into the far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. As to others, their evils call out in us the active virtues of sympathy, benevolence, helpfulness, brotherly kindness and charity. And so we have but to look to "the end of the Lord," to see that His providences are all good, and altogether good. However afflictive and painful, they are but chastisements from Love's own hand—with never a stroke unneeded, never a stroke too much, never a stroke too hard. "Behold, we count them happy which endure"

New York Letter.

By S. T. Willis.

All the metropolis is agog over the generous offer of Mr. Andrew Carnegie to give $5,200,000 for the enlargement of New York's library facilities. Mr. Carnegie proposes to furnish the money to build sixty-five branch buildings for the New York Public Library, through which the best literature could be circulated to the uttermost parts of the city. His offer is indeed a generous one, and one the nature of which makes for the moral and intellectual uplifting of the people. Mr. Carnegie has been severely criticised for hoarding up wealth, some even thinking that he should have distributed his surplus earnings proportionately among the people, annually, giving it to those who helped to make it. Suppose he had done so; would the world be much better off to-day? It brings to mind the case of two socialists who called one day on Mr. Rothschild in Paris, reminded him that he was a robber because he held great surplus wealth and earnestly demanded that he should make an equal distribution of his wealth among the citizens of the community. To their surprise and embarrassment he did not call the police, nor did he even demur. He simply said: "Certainly, citizens, with all pleasure in the world. My fortune is about 50,000,000 francs. There are about two million people in Paris—that is about 25 francs apiece. Here are your shares—25 francs each. Now of course you are quite satisfied. Good-day, citizens!"

If Mr. Carnegie had day by day distributed all his profits among the people, each of his employes would have had a few more cents each day, and each of his customers would have got his iron and steel for a fraction of a cent less on the pound. At the end of the year neither the individual nor the community would have been perceptibly better off. There would be no vast accumulation with which to create a pension fund for employes and to found schools and to establish great libraries. It is much better for the public that rich men give their wealth to the people in large sums for the moral, educational and religious uplifting of men than that distribution per capita be made.

Suppose Mr. Carnegie, instead of giving $5,200,000 for the building of sixty-five libraries, should distribute the same amount among the people of New York. They would get about $1.50 each. Would the people of New York realize the difference after one week's time? But as it now is the money will afford employment to thousands of men in building the libraries; it will make places for hundreds of people in the running of the libraries; it will create a demand for the publisher's wares and the author's best labors by increasing the reading public; and it will prove a benediction to the citizens of New York for generations to come, and indirectly it will prove a blessing to the whole country. Great wealth so used is a blessing and not a curse, both to him who gives it and to him who receives it.

The downpouring rain from the clouds of heaven is a blessing to the earth, but it never could supply the wants of the people if it were not collected here and there in bubbling springs, wells, cisterns, great reservoirs, and rivulets, rivers and lakes, here to turn the wheels of a great mill, there to quench the thirst of beasts, and yonder to supply the necessities of a great city. So it is in the wise accumulation and generous distribution of wealth.

At the last luncheon of the Alumni Club of Union Seminary a departure was made which proved successful and also pleasant. It was called a "Ladies' Luncheon" and each member was allowed to bring his wife or intended wife. One hundred and fifty guests sat down to lunch together at the Herald Square Hotel on Monday, March 18, about one half the number being ladies. After luncheon, Mrs. Edward Payson Terhune (Marion Harland) addressed the club on "Ministers' Wives." Her address was excellent in matter and admirable in manner of delivery. She spoke from the view point of thirty years' experience as a minister's wife and from that of wide observation. Clearness of thought, elegance and grace of expression, a sympathetic spirit and pleasing humor characterized her paper. Mrs. Edward Perkins Clark (Kate Upson Clark) also made an address on "Theology, Emotion and Woman," which was well received.

At a recent meeting of the Presbyterian Union in this city the question of Creed Revision was the dominant issue. Prof. Henry Van Dyke came in for a share of criticism at the hands of Rev. Dr. John De Witt, of Princeton, who said:

Science, philosophy and theology are the three great modes of organizimg the universe into an intelligent system. Science never rises above second causes. When it does it is no longer science. It "suffers a sea change" and becomes philosophy. For philosophy views the universe as a unity, and the goal it is always seeking to reach is the source and centre of this unity, the absolute first cause, the ultimate ground of all. Now, the goal of philosophy is the postulate and point of departure of theology. What philosophy is striving to find, theology asserts has been found.

He thinks the Presbyterian Confession of Faith should remain unchanged, and be reaffirmed.

President Steward, of Auburn Seminary, said:

We need a new creed. We have the right to one. Surely the Westminster divines who exercised this privilege themselves would be the last to deny it to others. "As all synods and councils may err, through the frailty inseparable from humanity," the constitution of our Church has made provision for the amendment of our doctrinal standards. The amendment may be by a new statement throughout. The right to formulate a creed carries the right to change it. Every age has the right to state its own faith in its own way. If we wish to convince the world that we have a faith that has reality and definiteness, we must seriously set about formulating it.

Prof. Johnson, of Chicago, plead for a restatement of the old Confession, saying:

Across our Confesssion could justly be written, "the gospel for the elect only." I say this with the profoundest respect for the fathers, and in the fullest appreciation of the doctrine they wrought out. But it was written under the absolute dominance of one idea—the doctrine of predestination, based on the unconditioned sovereignty of God.

Kansas City Letter.

This city has had within its gates for three weeks past, a prodigy. It is not often in these dead-level days that such a bit of news can be chronicled. The prodigy is a "boy preacher." And a "boy" preacher he is sure enough. The evangelist Harrison enjoyed this distinction when he was of the tender age of forty and other "boy preachers" we have known whose stay at Jericho has been sufficiently protracted to enable them to grow beards. But there is no hint of the counterfeit in this article, for this preacher is only fifteen years of age. His name is Jack Cooke. For weeks and weeks he has been preaching nightly at the Independence Avenue M. E. Church—the largest in the city—to crowded houses. Jack is not only a boy but he looks his part. In knee pants and wide sailor collar, slight of build and with a fine treble voice, he seems odd enough in a metropolitan pulpit, a pulpit that has for twelve years enjoyed the ministrations of the strongest preachers in the Methodist Church.

Jack's sermons are advertised as wholly impromptu. Every evening the audience assembled votes on the text from which Jack shall preach and the text receiving the largest number of votes is selected as the basis of the sermon. A sermon in the commonly accepted meaning it is not. There is nothing of formal analysis, little of consecutive thought, but as a rhapsody it is in every way remarkable. The boy's vocabulary is large and choice and his diction nothing less than marvelous. His thought, too, in so far as in glowing rhapsody you catch a glint of it, is elevated and spiritual. A forceful delivery he cannot be said to possess nor has he much of that subtle thing we call magnetism. Yet crowds continue to throng the spacious church. Last Sunday night all the rooms of the building were thrown open and Jack preached three sermons to as many thousand people. Of course multitudes go out of mere curiosity but many beyond doubt are genuinely attracted to this youthful evangelist of Christ.

The singing is conducted by one of Jack's brothers, himself only nineteen years of age. This singer also conducts the devotional exercises and the "after meetings." The services cannot be said to be free from the spectacular, and the sensationalism which so frequently comes in to mar is not absent. The usual "manipulations" characteristic of the revivals of this denomination are in evidence and to one unused to such, are disquieting and hindering. But who are we who judge? These meetings are not wholly to our liking and yet we can but praise the fervid evangelistic spirit out of which these aberrations grow. If the Methodists were less in earnest we should have less to criticise in them. Their very defects—from our standpoint—are rooted in a mistaken zeal.

Jack's spiritual biography is altogether out of the ordinary. Reared by pious parents whose one desire was to see him an evangelist he was in tenderest years of serious temperament and when only eleven years of age fell into a trance state. From this trance he came—so runs the story in the little book which you can buy from the industrious boys who stand at the church door crying, "Here's your life of Jack, for ten cents!"—with the words, "it is of the Lord," and from that moment began to preach. His first sermons were preached in London, his home. Then his fame grew, his parish was extended, and now, after only four years of evangelistic work, he is touring our American cities.

Jack claims for himself a certain kind of inspiration. "It is of the Lord," he is ever saying. He answers all kinds of questions without any sort of study or reflection, offhandedly, as we say, and it must be confessed with more than ordinary pith and good sense.

Account for him? Nay, that is your task. The outline has been given. Here is the boy, in every way a marvel. At least he possesses the inspiration of genius and he gives promise of a wonderful career.

And yet we are reminded how often these precocious ones come to naught. Jack may be at his intellectual and spiritual culmination even now, coming to full flower in early May. In any case this spring flower is worth the looking at. GEORGE H. COMBS.

"Was Campbell a Disciple of Locke?"

The writer of an article under the above caption in one of our religious papers recently attempted to make it clear that great wrong had been done to two distinguished characters in history, and that, as a matter of fact grounded on incontestable evidence, Campbell was not a disciple of Locke. The attempt was so far successful that "a reviewer" in one of our religious papers, in attempting a reply, found it convenient to ignore the body of the thought and confine himself to one of the smallest articles of apparel it had on. Thus again was acted "the play of Hamlet, with Hamlet left out." It is needless to say, it still remains that Campbell's teachings were not cast in the mold of Locke's philosophy, and several important things follow. Among this multitude of consequences, the truth that "Campbell had no theology at all" lies like a planet so far remote as to be beyond the reach of the naked eye. Thus, with a deep sea to swim in, our reviewer confines himself to dabbling in the shallows.

In the body of his first paragraph we read: "Those who have taken an interest in considering the relation of Campbell to Locke maintain—the influence the philosopher exerted on the thinkers of that time was entirely legitimate and that they could not help using —." It follows from such reasoning that Campbell was the victim of his environments. He could not help his thinking! The influence Locke exerted over him was "entirely legitimate," and therefore could not have been "undue." Thus, all things, to storms and suicides, are under "legitimate influences," and the one is no more moral or immoral than the other. Campbell could not help thinking Locke! On the question, just how, then, he could help using the denominational influences that lay about him still more dense, our reviewer throws no light. Surely this is materialism run mad!

In his second paragraph, our reviewer raises the question: "What is the objection to writing a book on Paul's theology or Christ's theology?" Sure enough! What is the objection to a Methodist theology, a Presbyterian theology, or all the theologies under which our race is groaning to-day? A few sentences farther along our reviewer gives us an answer. "The removal of theology from its usurped place." Yes, that is it! Theology has always been a usurper —confounding itself in the minds of the people with the gospel. It is as changeable as the other sciences named by our reviewer. Twelve years is sufficient to relegate the text-books of every one of them to the cellar. Thus, theology crowding itself into the place of Christianity and making believe it is Christianity, as the innocent people note its vacillations they are kept all the time fearing the bottom is about to fall out of the universe! "Cut it down, why cumbereth it the ground?"

To claim that a man cannot be mighty in the gospel, while at the same time ignoring something as widely removed from it as theology, is absurd. The thing that is changing so rapidly these days, that is whirling the heads off of many men, is not Christianity, it is theology. The faith once for all delivered to the saints contained no teaching that had to be corrected as knowledge improved on the subject. It has not grown an inch or shrunk an inch in all these thousand fluctuating years of science! We know who is the beginner and finisher of Christianity, but we do not know who next will try his hand on theology. Sure are we of this, however, that theology is one of the most unfinished things in the world. That is the reason the Christian Church has Bible-schools but no theological seminaries.

The main drift of our reviewer's argument is for the non-creedal use of theology. That is, we should have theologies and creeds, but not use them as theologies and creeds! This, we are assured, characterized Campbell. "The most important and significant thing about Campbell's theology was the use he made of it. It was not a creed. It was not claimed to be all the truth. It was not the theology of a church. It was simply Alexander Campbell's theology." "The most important and significant thing about" this statement is that it is a series of assumptions. That Campbell, the scholar and brainiest man of his age, did not found a theological school, refused to wear the title of a theologian, shows the very name of theology was distasteful to him as it is unscriptural. The proof of this is that he industriously taught and preached "the use of Bible words to express Bible things," discarding theological terminology as "the language of Ashdod." That the essential mission of such a man was some mild stricture on the abuse of the creeds and theologies of his day, let him believe who can—not I. IRA BILLMAN.

[The above is a convincing illustration of a statement in the article which it criticises —that any word in defense of a proper use of theology is sure to be followed by a small panic on the part of those who can see no distinction between a theology and a creed. Our recent editorial on "The Value of Theology" was in no sense intended as a "review" of Bro. Billman's article entitled "Was Campbell a Disciple of Locke?" though it was suggested by it. Our friendly critic, therefore, confers upon us an unsought honor when he dignifies us by the title of his "reviewer." For the same reason we felt at liberty to "ignore" the question of fact regarding Campbell's Lockianism almost as completely as he has ignored it (in spite of the title) in the above.

In facetiously characterizing the general question of the value of theology as "the shallows" and the question whether Campbell was a Lockian as "the deep sea," he exhibits a curious failure to see the problems in their proper perspective. The characterizations might better have been reversed. The fact that, as we believe, Campbell held to the philosophy of John Locke, is a mere historical detail. The value of theology and the absolute distinction between a theology and a creed, are principles fundamental to religious thinking, and to characterize them as "shallows" is a mark of shallowness. It will be observed that the above article criticizes two points in the said editorial:

1. Our statement that Locke's influence upon Campbell was both justifiable and necessary, is denied. In that word "necessary" our critic finds a dangerous determinism. He argues that, if a thinker must use certain intellectual tools and can use only those which are at hand (that is what our statement means), then "storms and suicides are under legitimate influences and the one is no more moral or immoral than the other." This reasoning is too subtle for us. We cannot follow it. Philosophical concepts are tools. Locke's system had practically universal acceptance in Campbell's day in England and America. The Deists had used it and had lost faith in revelation. The Apologists had used it to down the Deists. Hume had used it and had landed in agnosticism. Diderot and D'Alembert in France had used it and ended in blank atheism. Campbell used it and it showed him how dependent man is upon divine revelation and the authority of Scripture. The philosophical tool was ready to his hand. It was his to determine what he would do with it.

2. Our critic denies that theology is a legitimate science so long as it is not used as a creed. This, says our critic, is equivalent to saying that "we should have theologies and creeds but not use them as theologies and creeds." Begging his pardon, we repudiate the unauthorized insertion of "and creeds" in the first part of that sentence and "theologies and" in the second, and beg leave to remind him that the chief point in the article which he is criticizing is a distinction between theologies and creeds. He has, therefore, no right to put into our mouth a statement which treats them as synonymous.

We have never asserted that Mr. Campbell's essential mission was a "mild stricture on the abuse of the creeds and theologies of his day." It was a ringing denunciation. The fact that he may not always have paused in the heat of his battle to discriminate nicely between a creed and a non-creedal theology is but little to the point. The reformer is seldom an accurate discriminator. His policy, in his destructive period, is: When you see a head, hit it! When the revolutionary soldiers shouted "Down with King George!" they did not stop to explain that they meant only down with his kingship over them and fully admitted his rights as King of England. They simply shouted "Down with King George!" and let it go at that. When the war was over it was found that the opening of diplomatic relations with England was not prejudicial to the maintenance of liberty. So the cry of "Down with theology" has been made. It was good as a battle cry but it is entirely insufficient as a statement of the whole case. Whatever Mr. Campbell may have said about theology, the fact remains that he had one.—EDITOR.]

How Much of New Testament Christianity Should be Restored?

By F. M. GREEN

The Christianity of the New Testament consists of the Teaching and Practice of Jesus the Christ and his Apostles. That teaching and practice is found in the four biographies of Jesus, as given by Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, in the Acts of the Apostles and in the apostolic writings, beginning with the book of Romans and ending with the Epistle of Jude. Christians are the followers of Christ. Christianity is the religion of Christians or the system of teaching, faith and practice taught by Christ and to be observed by Christians.

I. In Christianity, as thus defined and understood, there are some things of a temporary and some of a permanent character. The temporary and permanent features of New Testament Christianity are not difficult to discover by the careful reader and student of the New Testament. The temporary served its purpose and passed away with the time of Christ and his apostles. The permanent remains for all time and will be contemporary with every age. The temporary need not be restored, for its mission has been fulfilled. The permanent is to remain, and, if in the changes of the years or centuries any part has been lost, covered up, or overlooked, it is to be restored.

Has any part of the Christianity of the New Testament been displaced or overlooked and lost? If so, what has been lost should be restored.

1. In the New Testament we find (Matt. 16:16) a simple and comprehensive confession of faith—"Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God"—on which Jesus the Christ said, "I will build my church." This confession declared the Messiahship and Deity of Jesus of Nazareth. This confession has been practically displaced by human formulas of doctrine more or less complex and elaborate which have been made the basis of denominational churches.

This simple, comprehensive and sublime confession should be restored to its proper place; and until it is restored there can be no unity in New Testament doctrine and practice.

2. That this confession is the only creed which divine wisdom has formulated for the faith of each person who desires salvation is manifest to all who study the great commission of Jesus as given to his apostles; and their preaching and practice as recorded in the Acts of Apostles. (See Matt. 28:16-20; Mark 16:14-18; Luke 24:44-49; John 20:21-31; Acts 2:32-39; Acts 4:10-12 and onward.) This creed without addition or subtraction should be restored.

3. In regard to preaching the gospel, both in matter and manner, there have been serious and fatal departures from the New Testament teaching and practice. "Preach the word," said the apostle (2 Tim. 4:2), and "they so spake that a great multitude both of Jews and of Greeks believed" (Acts 14:1). (See 1 Cor. 15:1, 2.) The gospel proclamation consists of facts concerning Jesus the Christ to be believed; of commands to be obeyed; of promises to be enjoyed; and threatenings to be feared. These facts, commands, promises and threatenings are found in the great commission of Christ to his apostles and constitute the basis of all apostolic preaching and the practice of all apostolic Disciples. (See Matt. 28:16-20; Mark 16:14-16; Luke 24:44-49; John 20:21-31.) The great commission embraces all the constitutional requirements of complete conversion from sin. As these requirements are constitutional they cannot be changed until the great Law-giver changes them. No body of men, however gifted, no church court, however constituted, no human tribunal, however venerable, has any authority or right to change them. The apostles of Christ declared this gospel, preached this word and insisted on the "obedience of faith"—nothing more, nothing less, in order to salvation from sin and entry into the Church of God. In so far as this preaching has been varied from or perverted, to that extent it must be restored.

4. The memory ordinance of the New Testament is the Lord's Supper. In the realm of God's grace in which all Christians are to grow, divine wisdom has placed this ordinance at regular weekly intervals. In Acts 20:7 it is written: "And upon the first day of the week when the disciples came together to break bread Paul preached unto them." Beyond seven days no Christian need go without being reminded of the fact that Jesus "died for our sins according to the Scriptures." And on the first day of every week—the resurrection day—every disciple who desires to honor his Lord will do so, if possible, by regarding the day and the ordinance. The weekly observance of the Lord's Supper should be restored to the place it occupied in New Testament times, for its observance was not to be temporary but "until he come" (1 Cor. 11:26). "For as often as ye eat this bread and drink the cup ye proclaim the Lord's death till he come."

5. If we study carefully the life of Christ and his true disciples as revealed in the New Testament, we will find that their main characteristics are universal kindness and beneficence or grace and love; purity in word and deed; real holiness or consecration to God; truthfulness and absolute sincerity; humility and lowliness. These are essentially Christian principles and are all represented in New Testament teaching and practice, and in so far as they have been overlooked or lost sight of by modern Christians should be restored.

II. Of New Testament Christianity it may be said: It is what it is and why it is by the fact that there once lived upon the earth a sacred and divine life, supremely, superhumanly and transcendently true and wise and good. That life was above the limitations of time, country or party. It revealed to mankind the fullest and completest insight ever given into "the heart of the eternal and supreme;" and Christianity shall be what it may yet become in proportion as that life is lived over again in personal example and influence by those who aspire towards that perfect ideal. To live the Christ life is to be a Christian, and in proportion as we live that life "we all with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory even as by the spirit of the Lord."

An inspector of schools in England once said: "As I go from school to school, I perceive in each a distinctive character which is that of the master. I look at the school and I look at the master, and there is no mistaking the resemblance; his idiosyncrasy has passed to the school, I seem to see him reflected in the children as in so many fragments of a broken mirror." If we go to school to Christ and let our behavior be such as becometh the gospel of Christ, we will grow into Christ's image and character, and the world will easily see that we have been with him.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

An examination of church statistics shows that so-called liberalism is not really popular with the people. The churches that are increasing in numbers are the churches that are not noted for their liberality. The orthodox churches are the growing churches. Consider, please, the following facts:

The Lutheran Church gained, from 1890 to 1900, 2,119 ministers, 2,528 churches, and 434,806 members. The Episcopalians gained, during the same decade, 815 ministers, 1,667 churches and 184,377 members. The Presbyterians, North, gained during this period 1,401 ministers, 752 churches, 185,209 members. The Presbyterian Church, South, gained 332 ministers, 568 churches, 46,169 members. The Cumberland Presbyterian Church from 1890 to 1900 suffered a loss of 127 in the ministry, but gained 166 churches and 15,252 communicants. The Congregationalists gained 556 ministers, 736 churches, 117,103 members, from 1890 to 1900. The Methodist Episcopal Church gained 2,098 ministers, 3,177 churches, 476,083 members, during the last decade of the Nineteenth Century. At the same time the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, gained 1,240 ministers, 1,556 churches, 247,888 communicants. The Baptists, in the North, added 730 to their ministerial force, 1,467 to their list of churches, and 173,370 to their membership. The Southern Baptists increased the number of their ministers by 3,101, their churches by 2,725, and their members by 328,347. The growth of the Negro Baptists, during the ten years from 1890 to 1900, was most remarkable. They gained 8,883 ministers, 3,121 churches and 515,611 members. See now how it stands with the Unitarian, Universalist and "Christian" Churches. These are called liberal. The Unitarians gained, during the last ten years of the last century, 35 ministers, 38 churches and 3,251 members. The Universalists gained 27 ministers, lost 192 churches, gained 768 members. The "Christians" lost 187 ministers, gained 96 churches and 8,113 members.

Did I not speak soberly when I said that liberalism is not really popular with the people, that the churches in which there has been, during the last ten years, a numerical increase are not the denominations that are noted for their liberality, and that the churches bearing the orthodox label are the growing churches? Do not the above statistics show that I spoke the truth in the foregoing affirmations?

The baptism of the Baptists is, apparently, not popular; but the Baptists—North, South, Negro—have grown, and are now growing, with great rapidity. Their close communion notions subject them to ridicule—but they grow. The Lutherans are so exceedingly conservative as to be veritable "mossbacks"—but the Lutheran ministers, churches and communicants have increased rapidly. The Methodists are somewhat "antiquated" but they persist in growing. The Presbyterians stand stubbornly by the old facts and truths of the gospel, and they grow. The Episcopalians say over again and again, in their weekly "service," the same old things in the same old way—and the Episcopalians are making encouraging progress.

How do you account for the fact that the growing churches are the churches that stand for the old truths of divine revelation, are the denominations which, from the point of view occupied by the liberal churches, are "behind the times," "out of date," "conservatives," even "mossbacks"? How do you account for the fact? And how do you account for the fact that "the liberal churches"—especially the Unitarian and Universalist—do not hold their own? Here is a problem.

Here is another interesting fact—the churches that are making progress are missionary churches.

The Congregationalists have missionaries in India, the Hawaiian Islands, Turkey, China, Persia, Africa (East and West), Micronesia, Japan, Mexico, Spain and Austria; the Baptists, North, have missionaries in Burma, India, Africa, Congo, China and Japan; the Southern Baptists have missionaries in Africa (West), China, South America, Mexico, Japan and Italy; the Methodists, North, have missionaries in Africa (West), South America, India, China, Bulgaria, Europe and Mexico, Japan, Korea and Malaysia; the Southern Methodists have missionaries in China, Mexico, Brazil and Japan; the Presbyterians, North, have missionaries in Syria, Persia, Africa (West), India, Siam, China, Japan, South America, Mexico, Guatemala and Korea; the General Synod of the Lutheran Church is at work in India and Africa; the Protestant Episcopal Church has missionaries in Africa (West), Greece, China, Japan and Haiti, and the Southern Presbyterians are at work in China, Brazil, Mexico, Greece, Japan, Africa and the Congo Free State.

When Jesus was leaving the earth he said to his friends: "Preach the gospel to the whole creation." He told his chosen ones to "make disciples of all the nations." He told them that if they would do this work he would be with them always. Those who are now engaged in the work of world-wide evangelization have the blessing of their Lord upon them. They are learning by experience that the Christ redeems his promises when his people obey, or attempt to obey, his commands.

The disciples have evidence of this in their own experience; when they set about doing the will of the Master in the heralding of the joyful message to the whole creation such a degree of prosperity came to them as at no previous period in their history. Since they began the work of making disciples of all the nations they have grown with marvelous rapidity. They have not only grown in numbers, but they have grown in intelligence and in spirituality as well. They are a more truly Christian people than they were before the organization of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions and the Foreign Christian Missionary Society.

Our congregations that give to missions are our really prosperous churches. The way to pay a church debt is via Japan, China, India. When a people become interested in a world-large work they will find money with which to pay their debts at home. If I were trying to get a church out of debt I would preach missions. A congregation that will not contribute to send the gospel to the ends of the earth if it is now in debt, will probably remain in debt. The chances are that it will not only remain in debt, but that its spiritual power will diminish. The way in which a church may secure genuine prosperity is to be really Christian. But to be really Christian is, in a practical way, to stand by the facts, truths, principles and precepts of the gospel. Courage, my brother! If God be for us who can be against us? And if we are for God in the doing of his will, as made known in his commands, He certainly will be with us in abundant blessing.

A Living Satirist

By FRANK G. TYRRELL

"It takes great strength to train
To modern service your ancestral brain;
To lift the weight of the unnumbered years
Of dead men's habits, methods, and ideas;
To hold that back with one hand, and support
With the other the weak steps of a new thought."

Thus Charlotte Perkins Stetson—who by the way is a grand-niece of Henry Ward Beecher—writes on "Heroism," in a little volume of satirical poetry entitled, "In This Our World."* This is a book that the preacher should read. He is not overlooked in the collection; witness the following:

Preach about yesterday, Preacher!
The time so far away:
When the hand of Deity smote and slew,
And the heathen plagued the stiff-necked Jew;
Or when the Man of Sorrows came,
And blessed the people who cursed His name—
Preach about yesterday, Preacher!
Not about to-day!

In similar strains she exhorts us to "Preach about to-morrow," and about "the old sins,—not the new," and about "the other fellow,—not about me!"

How often we hear the phrase,—"A man must live!" In a poem of fifteen lines she satirizes that.

But is it so? Pray tell me why
Life at such cost you have to buy?
In what religion were you told
A man must live?

There are times when a man must die.
Imagine, for a battle-cry,
From soldiers, with a sword to hold,
From soldiers, with the flag unrolled,
This coward's whine, this liar's lie,—
"A man must live!"

There is tonic in such writing, and most of the poems in the volume are of just that kind. The intensely practical character of this woman's work is seen in the poem, "For Us." The first verse reads,—

"If we have not learned that God's in man,
And man in God again;
That to love thy God is to love thy brother,
And to serve the Lord is to serve each other,—
Then Christ was born in vain."

There is again and again in her lines the thrilling call of the clarion. She does not touch her lips to an amorous lute, or twang the vibrant strings of a languorous harp. You hear the summons to action, sturdy, heroic, sustained; the blood pulses more swiftly and your fading enthusiasm mounts again to a flame. One cannot but wonder whether the thrust is at the "prophets" of the modern pulpit when she says,—

Time was we stoned the Prophets. Age on age
When men were strong to save, the world hath slain them.
People are wiser now; they waste no rage—
The Prophets entertain them!

What faithful preacher has not shrunk from a mere life in the world's mouth, the fate of a religious orator! Robertson, of Brighton, could not bear the thought of being so considered. Sermons that are earnestly meant to arouse sleepy consciences often minister to a sort of intellectual voluptuousness, as sensuous as the pleasures of the palate.

The delight you feel in her polished satire breaks into a smile, if not audible laughter, when you read "A Conservative." It represents a person walking in his garden, pausing to take note of a new-born butterfly,—"all doleful and forlorn." In answer to his query as to what the trouble is, the butterfly complains of the loss of its many legs, its fuzzy fur, and the growth, instead, of "these flapping wing-things."

At that outrageous bug I shot
The fury of mine eye;
Said I, in scorn all burning hot,
In rage and anger high,
"You ignominious idiot,
Those wings are made to fly!"

"I do not want to fly," said he,
"I only want to squirm!"
And he dropped his wings dejectedly.
But still his voice was firm;
"I do not want to be a fly!
I want to be a worm!"

Disgusted, he leaves the "conservative," declaring,—

The last I saw was this,—
The creature madly climbing back
Into his chrysalis!

The book is divided into three sections,—"The World," "Woman" and "The March." All the poems mentioned above occur in the first section. The poet's discontent with the conventional is especially apparent when she speaks of woman and home, and we wish every woman in the land could read her. "The Holy Stove" might jar our conceptions of gustatory delight, but then perhaps they need jarring. Here is the last verse:—

"The wood-box hath no sanctity;
No glamor gilds the coal;
But the Cook-Stove is a sacred thing
To which a reverent faith we bring
And serve with heart and soul.
The Home's a temple all divine,
By the Poker and the Hod!
The Holy Stove is the altar fine,
The wife the priestess at the shrine—
Now who can be the god?

*Small, Maynard & Co., Boston. $1.25.

The poems on "Woman" cannot be read without encouraging the reader to hope for higher and better things for the sex, and for the race through her. In the collection entitled, "The March," we enter into the writer's radical economic views. She is more than "abreast of the times;" she leads the "times" by several lengths,—as any good poet should. "Charity" is a poem of five stanzas in which two little fellows are shown in their mother's pantry, one much bigger than the other. The big boy helps himself bountifully, and occasionally gives the little one a crumb,—and that is "charity."

"He gave and gave—O blessed Charity!
How sweet and beautiful a thing it is!
How fine to see that big boy giving free
What is not his!"

Mrs. Stetson visited St. Louis two years ago, and addressed our ministers. She is an intellectual dynamo. Her conversation flashes. And yet she is a charming woman, modest, gentle, and unpretentious.

A Serious Neglect.

By C. H. Wetherbe.

I notice that quite a number of the religious papers that I take are devoted mostly to discussions of doctrines and various questions, and that scarcely anything is printed on those subjects which are calculated to give cheer to sad hearts and strength to feeble spirituality. For a long time I have thought of the many readers who greatly need articles which are especially helpful to their hearts, which are fitted to nerve them for their trials, and which will encourage them to continue hopefully while bearing their burdens. It is a fact which some editors, as well as many preachers, seem to overlook, that there is not a week that some of their readers or hearers do not feel the need of some stimulating, soothing, consoling words.

The bereaved ones are ever with us. On all hands there is mourning over the death of dear ones. There are thousands who have their secret sorrows, and these are often the hardest to bear. Many are struggling with poverty. Hundreds who were once in good financial circumstances are now bereft of home and property. And even those who have an abundance of worldly goods are the subjects of melancholy moods and weary spirits.

There are many of this class who attend church services or religious meetings, and many also who read religious papers, and although they may have considerable interest in doctrinal discussions and gospel arguments, yet they often long for sweet gospel messages, cheering passages from the Bible, illustrations of the power of God to provide timely help in trouble, and examples of the gracious goodness of a thoughtful Lord.

Notice the consolations which are furnished in Christ's Sermon on the Mount, and many of his recorded utterances besides. He discussed questions, but he did not confine himself to such matters. He dealt in great doctrines, but he also threw out beaming words of comfort. Paul gave masterly arguments on weighty themes, but observe how frequently he penned most uplifting sentences, radiant with hope and promise.

Some of the religious papers which I take are so dry with discussions upon abstract themes that I often wonder how the readers can endure them. And some preachers keep pegging away on dead straw, while the hearts of many of their hearers are aching with sorrow.

Let there be more editorials and sermons of such a character as will help to make lighter the loads which many are daily carrying.

China Letter.

What is the Political Situation?

There is a political deadlock. It is a temporary triumph of the yellow man's diplomacy over the confusion of the allied pink barbarians. The capital is still held by the combined forces. The court is still a refugee institution and while it suits the imperial cortege to add to the embarrassment of the already nonplussed foreign governments they will continue to move the same card and indulge in the same old cunning. It has been a matter of surprise to many of the foreign ministers that the delinquent Manchu court should be so slow to either return or to open up negotiations with the duly accredited foreign ministers in Peking. Many of the best informed civil and military authorities think that the Chinese court and its entourage is playing the double game of hoodwinking the easily deceived "devil from the ocean" until the winter season is over. Meanwhile it is an acknowledged fact that from all parts of the empire there is gathering around the central provinces—and particularly in the neighborhood of Hsian Fu, in Shansi, where the corrupt court is—the scum of the Dragon role in its military legions. It is said that these Manchu braves are there for the purpose of escorting the imperial party as soon as they are ready to begin the long and tedious, not to mention dangerous, journey back to Peking. The punitive expeditions to the large towns and cities in Chili and Shantung and the raids and expeditions of the allies in and around the desolated capital have apparently done very little to impress the corrupt mandarinate or the delinquent court.

The Missionary Outlook.

It is not to be wondered at that the missionary outlook is not at all clear. In the peace negotiations it would seem that the missionary question was relegated to a fifth rate place in the minds of the interested governments. Surely the magnitude of the issues involved, and their vital relations to the highest and most permanent interests of China, as well as of all other nations, should give the missionary cause some degree of prominence in the consideration of the case. It is a fact that in the preamble to the peace proposals it is not made at all plain that in the recent cataclysm the Chinese government declared war on everything progressive, modern and righteous. The diabolical violation of treaty obligations, and that after they have been in force for more than four decades, and the massacre of some two hundred missionaries, including women and children, not to mention the fact that there are also some thousands of native Christians who have been given the cruel alternative of recantation or death, while many hundreds were put to death under circumstances of the most atrocious barbarity—is surely enough to arouse more than a mere passing interest. The treaties must be reaffirmed or mission work cease. There must be religious liberty. Due protection must be afforded to missionaries residing with their families in the interior. The wrongs of the native Christians are an "appeal to humanity." Their stern, solid, faithful qualities have, for a time at least, silenced their false accusers and shown the true mettle of which these new converts are made. We trust their excellencies, the Peace Plenipotentiaries of Great Britian and the United States, accredited to the Chinese government, will do all in their power to settle these weighty considerations and to aid in bringing about a peace which shall be permanent, and which shall be an inspiration to China to arouse herself to a due sense of the weighty responsibilities and weightier and grander privileges that are in store for her in the day of her regeneration.

Our Workers.

The enforced residence in Shanghai of all our missionaries has not been without much attendant blessing. The newly opened mission hall for preaching on the most fashionable boulevard of the settlement has been crowded to excess. All of our workers preached. Literature was circulated; enquirers dealt with. The true ring of the gospel sounded out in one of the wickedest settlements in the far East. As a result of this work, which was thought to be a temporary thing at first, there are now hopes that the new mandarin speaking mission hall may be carried on by the China Inland Mission, whose workers will be for a long time yet prohibited from returning to their stations in the interior and who are in a position to take up this all-important line of work.

Some splendid work was done among the sailors and the boys of the American and British war ships by the consecrated service of our Miss Mary Kelly and Miss Effie D. Kellar. They entertained the boys in the home of Messrs. Titus and Garrett and kept them from the evil associations and the awful forms of vice which disgrace this so-called "model settlement." During the autumn and winter some large numbers of these bright and brave boys have been led to Christ. The workers cannot be suppressed. On the occasion of the return to Chu Cheo (for a visit) of Dr. E. I. Osgood and the writer, to attend to some important business, and particularly to encourage the native Christians in their days of trial and suspense—some soldiers looked into their faces and said, "Why, these missionaries have been killed once, and now they are back again."

At the Christian Institute, where our W. P. Bentley has his mission and institute, our workers have also been in attendance. Frank Garrett went to Luho and opened up and settled the business of the purchase of a large native house for a work for regular and residential station. T. J. Arnold and Dr. Macklin alternately visited Nanking. It will be remembered that our able and consecrated brother, the late Albert F. H. Saw, did a splendid work in the enterprising little city of Luho which gained for itself the name of "Little Nanking."

Dr. W. E. Macklin has been busy on translation work. He is one of the ablest men in China. He has translated some splendid works. Among them we might mention the "Life of Jefferson," the history of William the Silent, "Principles of Political and Religious Liberty." Besides this hard, solid, persistent work on the Chinese character, the Doctor has been an indefatigable preacher in the Chinese tea houses and opium dens.

During the crisis the workers lived in rented houses in Shanghai. C. E. Molland has returned to Wuhu. The death of their darling little son, Hugh, has staggered them and shattered Mrs. Molland's health. Dr. James Butchart has been busily engaged with religious services among the boys of the U. S. S. "Helena," "Oregon," and others.

Returning to Nanking.

All the other workers have now returned to Nanking. It is thought that the work can now be resumed. There are still some disquieting rumors. But we must work while it is called day. In a few months again the summer will be upon us when there can be no traveling done. Only a few of the treaty ports have opened up any of the regular work, and aggressive enterprise is out of the question. We cannot see afar off. We do not ask to see. But we do ask the great brotherhood to bear us up continually before the throne of grace, and to pray that China may be speedily pacified, and that still wider doors may be opened to the entrance of the gospel. Above all let there be united, constant and believing prayer that God will send forth more laborers into the harvest to take the place of those who so recently laid down their lives in this storm-swept land.

Cured By Food.

Nature's Way to Get Well and Keep Well.

People who do not know how to select the right kind of food to sustain them become ill, and some sort of disease will show forth. It is worth one's while to know of these facts.

A young woman at Grindstone City, Mich., Mrs. A. P. Sage, began to run down while she was at school. She finally broke down completely and was taken seriously ill with a number of different troubles. The stomach trouble was the most serious one. Her heart also troubled her so she had to sit up as high in bed as possible. This was caused however by her stomach.

She says, "In the morning I would be so weak I could hardly move. I was kept on the simplest foods, principally liquids. After some months I seemed to get a little better, then I got worse, so that I finally was brought to the point of death from non-assimilation of food."

At this time a lady recommended Grape-Nuts Food. She says: "Little did I think what a help it was to become to me. I became greatly interested when I read the description on the box, that the food was predigested and in the shape of grape-sugar.

"I had been unable to digest anything starchy at all, but I began on Grape-Nuts and it was so grateful to the taste, and soothed my stomach so well that I have been using it ever since, and have never grown tired of it.

"My stomach trouble is entirely gone. I am much stronger now and can ride a bicycle and take long walks, and have gained very considerably in weight, all of which I owe to Grape-Nuts Food."

Current Literature.

Mr. Albert G. Robinson has had wide experience as an observer of peoples and military operations and his facilities for seeing the course of events in the Philippines have been excellent. His book, The Philippines: The War and the People, consists largely of letters written by him during 1899 for the New York Evening Post and but little revised. He admits that the book constitutes to a degree a brief in defense of the insurgent Filipinos, but disclaims any partisan bias. He maintains that Aguinaldo is an honest patriot, and a capable leader without inordinate ambition. It is admitted that he received certain funds from Spain in consideration of his withdrawal from the islands in 1897 and it might have been well, perhaps, in view of the fact that much of the attack upon Aguinaldo's integrity centers about this point, to have defended him against the accusation of selling out to Spain, if there is any defense to be made. Although terms had been agreed to between the Spanish and the insurgents and the leaders of the latter had left the islands, the rebellion of 1896, says Mr. Robinson, had not been put down when Admiral Dewey sailed into Manila Bay but was only smoldering. The Spanish had paid only a small part of the sum which they had promised to pay and it is admitted that the Filipinos also had neglected to fulfill their part of the stipulated conditions. The rebellion would have broken out again even if the United States had had nothing to do with the Philippines.

The author's discussion of the much-disputed point, whether or not the Filipino leaders were led to believe that the United States would grant them independence, exhibits quite clearly his manner of thought and point of view. He speaks as a Filipino, tells how they thought and felt, and ignores those fundamental distinctions which they would be likely to ignore. It is evidently the author's belief that the Filipinos were entirely justified in expecting independence, yet he quotes the dispatch which was sent from Washington as soon as the Department of State received word that the insurgent leaders had been consulted at all, to the effect that the future status of the Filipinos was a matter which must be considered later and that if any representative of the United States had promised independence he had exceeded his authority. Mr. Robinson's survey of the case from an anti-administration point of view is a convincing argument to prove that the administration acted in good faith with the natives and made no false promises.

The criticism of the censorship which was exercised over all dispatches and press reports from the Philippines is a severe, and apparently just, arraignment. In regard to the degree of pacification which had been effected by the November dispersion of 1899, the reader is given a choice between considering Dean Worcester as either hopelessly untruthful or recklessly incompetent as an observer. The criticism on the reports of the first Philippine commission is, on the whole, not convincing. It is an ephemeral book so far as the general reader is concerned but one which contains some useful material which will be of service to the future historian when the history of the war is written in its proper perspective, as it cannot be written now. (McClure, Phillips & Co.)

"A Christian or a Church Member, Which?" is the title of a booklet of 27 pages recently issued by John G. M. Lutenberger, pastor of the Christian Church at Gillespie, Ill. The author covers a wide range of subjects in brief and pointed style, giving a critique of the most dangerous religious errors of the present day, both in the church and out of it. Catholicism, Lutheranism, Christian Science, Universalism, infidelity, faith cure and a great many other things are strongly treated with a brevity which will please the busy man. The author is at his best in speaking of the evils of denominationalism and the one way for Christians to overcome the world. Address the author, Dorchester, Ill. Price 15 cents.

John Fox, Jr., has succeeded, where most of the other writers have failed, in writing a really good story with the Spanish-American war for a setting. Crittenden: A Kentucky Story of Love and War, depicts a group of situations, including a village in the blue grass country, the camp at Chickamauga, the big hotel at Tampa where the officers awaited the final orders to sail, and the battle of Santiago. It is good description, all of it, such as those Kentuckians know how to write, and the parts which describe the battle have the true feel and atmosphere of war. The story itself really does not amount to much and is obviously a secondary consideration. It illustrates, however, the author's dictum, that there is only one situation between a man and a woman more full of romantic possibilities than that when the man is about to leave for war—and that one is when the man has just returned from the war. (Scribners, $1.50.)

A new book on flowers written from a new point of view is Mrs. Mabel Osgood Wright's "The Flowers and Ferns in their Haunts." It follows an out-of-door method of studying botany and treats the flowers not as specimens but as a factor in landscape. It appeals rather to human interests than to scientific interests. Such botany as it contains is sugar-coated and its function is rather to stimulate an intelligent admiration for flowers and a knowledge of their haunts and seasons.

Under the somewhat enigmatical title, "While Sewing Sandals," Emma Rauschenbusch-Clough publishes a group of Indian tales dealing with an outcast tribe of leather-workers among the Telugus in southern India. The stories are told from the missionary point of view and much curious and interesting information is given in regard to this little-known group of people. (Revell Co. $1.50.)

Accept congratulations upon manifest improvement of a grand family paper. May deserved success be with you.

Protracted sickness and death in the family circle has prevented help on my part for the last three years. Hope to be more helpful in the future. A. B. Wade.

March 18, 1901.

Our Budget.

—W. H. Bagby, of Salt Lake City, has for the second time been made president of the Ministers' Association of that city.

—It is announced by the Austin (Texas) Statesman that J. W. Lowber has been elected a member of the American Association for the advancement of science.

—J. C. Coggins, of the Tabernacle Church, Decatur, Ill., has been invited to deliver an address at the commencement of Grant University, Tenn.

—Miss Emma Darst is the assistant to the pastor, I. J. Cahill, of the church at Dayton, O. She is a sister of E. W. Darst and will be useful in taking care of the 500 new members which have come in the recent meeting.

—A new house of worship at Hamilton, O., where G. O. Black is pastor, was dedicated March 17 by L. L. Carpenter. The audiences were large and more than $2,400 was raised to provide for the indebtedness.

—Prof. A. A. Hibner, of Austin College, has been called to remain the second year with the church at Effingham, Ill. The church is in a flourishing condition and thirty-seven were added during the past year.

—C. C. Carpenter has been called to preach full time at Thomson, Ill., where he has been preaching half time for the last nine months. This is the church's first attempt to support a preacher for his whole time.

—G. B. Van Arsdall has closed his first year's work at Peoria, during which time 71 members have been received into the church. He has issued a printed statement, which is admirable in not only summarizing the work of the past year but stating detailed plans for future work.

—This unsolicited testimonial comes from a reader who expresses approval of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST: "Allow me to congratulate you upon your good judgment in refraining from using one-half of the valuable space in your paper in telling how good the other half is."

—Mr. G. L. Kilbon, Field Secretary of the African Christian Endeavor Union, has just finished a six months' tour in a Cape cart visiting both Dutch and English societies. He does not expect the Transvaal and Orange River countries to be open to him for about a year.

—G. W. Thomas, pastor of the church at Hoopeston, Ill., sends the following notice: "The pastor and members of the Church of Christ at this place extend a cordial invitation to the brethren to attend the Central Illinois Christian Minister[illegible]l Institute to be held here April 9-11. Entertainment free. Those who expect to attend are requested to send their names not later than April 6 that entertainment may be provided."

—A correspondent informs us that he has made some valuable and patentable inventions but lacks the necessary funds to secure the patents and place them on the market. He is a shut-in. He has one invention in particular which he is sure would be successful and will give a half interest in it to any one who will furnish the $65 which it will cost to get it patented. Any one addressing this office can be put in communication with the inventor.

—Our attention is called to the fact that, in the "Editor's Easy Chair" in the issue of March 14, the editor encounters "the beautiful Wabash" while traveling in western Florida. "Suwannee" would have been more accurate. The editor wishes it distinctly understood that he contemplated no revision of the usually accepted geography and that he would not be in sympathy with any movement to substitute that modern but already worn-out ditty "The Banks of the Wabash" for the ancient but immortal ballad "The Suwannee River."

—O. D. Maple, of Cameron, Ill., has been ill with the grippe. He says his church is planning and working for a good Easter offering for the Christian Orphans' Home at St. Louis. Let the other churches remember that by common consent this is the day for the offering for the support of this national home for the fatherless and motherless little ones.

—The Orphans' Home in Louisville, Ky., has secured about $14,000 toward its $50,000 endowment fund. Most of the churches in Kentucky have promised to have a special Thanksgiving service in November in the interest of the Home and it is thought that from $10,000 to $15,000 will be raised in this way. Churches in others states may well do the same thing. Contributions should be sent to Robert H. Otter, Box 300, Louisville, Ky.

—B. B. Tyler has recently been elected state superintendent of the Normal department of the Colorado Sunday-school work. This is a position which will bring Bro. Tyler into close touch with all the Sunday-school people of the state, including all denominations. He is doing some of the best work of his life now at Denver and it is reported that there are additions to the South Broadway Church every Lord's day.

—Dr. W. T. Moore is dealing with large subjects in his series of lectures at the church in Terre Haute. The Terre Haute Gazette reports at the length of a column his lecture on "Science and Christianity." Other topics announced are "The Laws of Moses in Modern Life," "The Socialism of Jesus," "Are Two and Two Four?" "The Educational Problem," "John Bull and His Castle."

—We are requested to call attention to the nature and work of the National League of Improvement Associations, an organization which aims to affiliate local societies for the promotion of city and town improvements and to encourage the formation of new societies with the same purpose. There is much that can be done in this direction by co-operation and the League can easily become the clearing-house for valuable suggestions in regard to the making and keeping of streets and parks, the improvement of sanitary conditions and other measures for making our cities more beautiful and healthful. The corresponding secretary of the League is P. J. Thomas, Citizens' National Bank Bldg., Springfield, O.

—Bro. W. Pinkerton, of Gillespieville, O., writes in strong approval of the Twentieth Century New Testament, and the idea which it embodies. We would be glad to publish what he says in full had we not published a somewhat extensive review of this work a few days ago. Bro. Pinkerton has been interested in the work of Bible revision for more than forty years and holds the sound opinion that the New Testament should be put into the English which is most forcible and correct at the present time, but he recalls Alexander Campbell's comment that unhappily the best linguists in Greek and Hebrew have not always the best command of English style, and that, therefore, we often have accuracy of translation at the expense of felicity of diction.

—Every Disciple who has not yet contributed to the foreign missionary offering and every church which has not yet taken its offering should read with shame the report of the corresponding secretary of the receipts for the past week. A falling off of about 30 per cent. in the amount received and of nearly 40 per cent. in the number of contributing churches is a state of affairs little short of disgraceful. Plans have been made for the enlargement of the work this year, but we cannot have enlargement of the work and retrenchment of the offering. There is still one Lord's day remaining in this month, the last day of the month. Let all churches which have not taken their offering look upon it as the last day of grace and hasten to get on the right side of the books. We will still expect that the total offering will be greater than that of last year and will hope that the falling off in the number of contributing churches is due to the fact that many more have been continuing their campaign throughout the entire month and that their delay in remitting will be compensated by an increased amount when it comes. Let it be so.

—The new church at Albia, Iowa, of which R. H. Ingram is pastor, will be opened for worship Lord's day, April 14, L. L. Carpenter officiating. The church extends a cordial invitation to all former pastors and ex-members of this congregation and to neighboring churches.

—Bro. M. Lane and wife, of Joplin, Mo., celebrated their golden wedding on March 6. Bro. Lane is one of the pioneer preachers in southwest Missouri, has lived and worked in this state for more than 30 years and has lived in Joplin ever since the town came into being. He organized the church at Thurman and preached for it for 25 years and has in many ways assisted in the upbuilding of the cause. Bro. and Sister Lane have nine living children, 32 grandchildren and one great-grandchild. Our information comes through Bro. Turner of Joplin.

—The Central Church of Christ, North Tonawanda, N. Y., was organized March 14, with 42 charter members. The new church is the natural outgrowth of the mission Bible-school which has been conducted for the past two years at the corner of Wheatfield and Oliver streets. It promises to be a factor in this city for righteousness, and a generous contributor to our missionary enterprises. As the church will be self-sustaining it will be able to enter at once into an aggressive campaign for Christ. The services of an able and energetic preacher will be required, but as yet no call has been extended.

—A. W. Kokendoffer, pastor of the Forest Avenue Christian Church, Kansas City, has accepted a call to Mexico, Mo., and will take up the work in the latter part of April. The call has been under consideration for several weeks. Mr. Kokendoffer came to Kansas City ten years ago from Kentucky and in that time has built up the Forest Avenue Church into a strong, prosperous congregation and has housed it in a new building. He expects to have the indebtedness entirely provided for before leaving for Mexico. Last year there were 133 additions to the Forest Avenue Church and there have been 27 thus far this year. The choice of Bro. Kokendoffer for the Mexico Church will be highly satisfactory to that prominent congregation and its many friends. A successor has not yet been chosen for the Kansas City pastorate. A strong man is needed and one who for a year or so can live on a comparatively small salary. James Stark, 1518 Virginia Avenue, represents the committee which has charge of the matter.

Sunday-School Literature.

THE matter of Sunday-school Literature is one of very great importance. For, whether it should be so or not, the fact is that the character of the instruction given in nine-tenths of the Sunday-school classes throughout the country is determined by the contents of the Lesson Helps they use. This being true, and the fact that first impressions are most lasting, how important that Pastors and Superintendents of Christian Sunday-schools see that their Schools are supplied with Christian Periodicals. If the children are taught that one church is as good as another, that certain divine commands are of little or no importance, or can be changed or set aside by man, what effect will it have on the church of the future? "Think on these things."

We understand a FEW of our schools are using sectarian or union (so called) supplies, in order to save a few cents each quarter. Are you one of that number? Samples of our Supplies sent free.

CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING CO., ST. LOUIS.

—J. N. Lester closes a three-year pastorate at Belle Plain, Ill., on April 1. His health, while somewhat improved, is not yet good enough for him to undertake regular work at the present time and he will rest for a time, his address being 121 Hickory street, Waukegan, Ill.

—The Christian Publishing Company repeats its invitation to all persons interested in church music to send in suggestions concerning the new high-grade church hymnal which will be issued soon. Send lists of hymns that you think should be incorporated in such a book. Address, "Musical Editor, Christian Pub. Co., St. Louis."

—Singing Evangelist Guy B. Williamson would like to correspond with pastor or evangelist regarding meetings for May and June. Write him for terms and receive a copy of his book "Suggestions in Soul-winning." Permanent address, 915 Aubert Ave., St. Louis, Mo

—During the first three weeks of March, the Board of Church Extension received the following gifts, aside from its regular receipts: $250 from "A Friend;" $333.33 from "A Sister," on the Annuity Plan; $1,000 from "Friends" on the Annuity Plan; $2,000 from Dr. Geo. W. Taylor, of Princeton, Ill., on the Annuity Plan and $500 from Charles Mercer, Sr., of Bowling Green, Ohio—a total of $3,333.33 on the Annuity Plan and $750 in offerings.

—Cotner University is just in receipt of a gift of over three hundred volumes contributed by Dr. Albert Buxton, late Chancellor of Add Ran University. This, with over one hundred volumes formerly given by him, is a splendid contribution to a rapidly growing library. This collection contains valuable sets of books on history, literature and science. The Buxton alcove will henceforth occupy a conspicuous place in honor of the large-hearted giver. Never will aid in the equipment and endowment of Cotner be more opportune than now. It is hoped that other friends will be stimulated by Dr. Buxton's example.

—We beg the indulgence of the ministers and others who are kind enough to send us news from the churches, if we take the liberty sometimes to abbreviate their notices. With about fifty evangelistic notices to publish every week it is evident that we must study brevity. If we occasionally cut out complimentary references to pastors, evangelists or others, it is not done because of any disapproval of the sentiment expressed, but because in this department we want the most possible news in the fewest possible words and we believe that, where a church or a preacher has accomplished some definite result, a plain statement of what has been accomplished is the best, as well as the briefest, form of praise.

Book Notes.

Can you write short-hand? If not, would you not like to be able to do so? You will certainly answer "yes" to this question if you realize the importance of a knowledge of stenography to all persons engaged in business, to the student, the preacher, the teacher. Perhaps you have thought you could not learn short-hand unless you went away from home to attend a school or business college, at an expense of several hundred dollars. If you have thought this, you have thought wrong. Thousands of persons have learned short-hand at home, without a teacher, and you can do the same, if you wish. The only expense to you will be the cost of instruction books, which is not large. The books being secured all that is necessary is diligent application and practice We can supply the books. The Moran system of instruction is used in most of the better schools in the country. The complete set of books, comprising seven volumes, whereby any person of fair, average intelligence can become an expert stenographer, will cost you only $5.00. If desired, the books can be purchased singly, though it is cheaper to buy all together. If you are interested, write us for particulars.

What is Your Life? by W. J. Russell, is receiving the highest commendation from men who know a worthy work when they see it. If you have not already secured this new volume, do so at once. Of all the thousands of volumes annually published, not one in five hundred is so worthy of praise as this new work by Mr. Russell. It deals with practical, fundamental questions, which concern everyone. It is especially valuable for the young. Parents will do well to place this book in the hands of their boys and girls. It is a handsome book, well printed and bound, and the price is One Dollar.

The tragic death of Charles Humphrey, the great singer, has served to call renewed attention to Christian Science. For a time he was led into studying this strange teaching, though he finally rejected it and was never connected with the "Scientists." It is not unlikely, however, that the mental aberration which led to the taking of his own life was caused, in part at least, by the study of the Eddy doctrines. Have you a friend who is inclined to put faith in this wild conglomeration of foolish fancies? The very best thing you can do is to place in the hands of that friend a copy of Christian Science Dissected, by A. D. Sector. This is the best antidote for Eddyitis that has yet been discovered. Price, 25 cents.

Our great offer of The Campbell Library for $10.00, payable in installments, is still open. Remember that this set of books included all of Mr. Campbell's works that are in print, and, in addition, Grafton's Life of Alexander Campbell and Garrison's Alexander Campbell's Theology, making a total of thirteen works. This is a great offer, which has already led to a much wider circulation of Campbell's works than was ever known before. Let it be remembered, moreover, that the price of these works, sold singly, has been much reduced, as may be seen in our General Catalogue, sent free on request

HOW TO FIND OUT.

Fill a bottle or common glass with your water and let it stand twenty-four hours: a sediment or settling indicates an unhealthy condition of the kidneys; if it stains the linen it is evidence of kidney trouble; too frequent desire to pass it, or pain in the back is also convincing proof that the kidneys and bladder are out of order.

What to Do.

There is comfort in the knowledge so often expressed that Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney and bladder remedy, fulfills every wish in curing rheumatism, pain in the back, kidneys, liver, bladder and every part of the urinary passage. It corrects inability to hold water and scalding pain in passing it, or bad effects following use of liquor, wine or beer, and overcomes that unpleasant necessity of being compelled to go often during the day, and to get up many times during the night. The mild and the extraordinary effect of Swamp-Root is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases. If you need a medicine you should have the best. Sold by druggists in fifty-cent and one dollar sizes.

You may have a sample bottle of Swamp-Root and a book that tells more about it, both sent absolutely free by mail. Address Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y. When writing mention that you read this generous offer in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

Texas Letter.

Our state missionary convention will be held in Waco, June 5-10, instead of 20-24, as was stated in my last letter. The change in time is made so as to bring the closing exercises of Add-Ran University and the convention together, and thus enable many to attend both on a single trip. It is believed that this arrangement will be for the good of both the school and the convention.

It used to be thought by many that Texas was a safe resort for those who dared not violate law in the older states, and hence a few years since the prize-fighters came to Dallas and built an immense amphitheater (almost completed it) and published to the world that a great battle would be "pulled off" here. C. A. Culberson (then governor, now senator,) said it should not be, and it was not. Now, Gov. Sayers, having scented something of the same thing, announces that the prize-fighter must go, and go he will. Texas is a big place, but not big enough for the brutal sports of the modern pugilist.

The little church at Holland, after a hard struggle, has a beautiful new house.

A. J. Bush is writing some interesting papers in the Courier on "A Quarter of a Century in Texas."

Temple is wonderfully happy over the prospect of a new house, and we hope they may get it. S. D. Perkinson is the man to lead them to success.

W. L. Morrow, our pastor at Seymour, is also talking up a new house.

R. D. Shultz closes a splendid work at El Paso, and becomes pastor at Galveston, as successor of J. B. Haston.

Texas has an official flower. Our legislature has so decreed. The fight among the flowers for the honor was a hot one. The "white flower of commerce," the open cotton boll, and the buffalo clover, or "blue bonnet," led the opposing hosts. The "colonial dames" filled the galleries, and proved themselves the most efficient lobbyists ever seen in Austin. They championed, very naturally, the "blue bonnet," and their brothers, under "hats," bowed to the inevitable, and henceforth the flower of the Lone Star State is the blue bonnet. To the strictly matter-of-fact man this will never seem just, since twenty-three of our counties in 1899 produced more than 40,000 500-pound bales each, which exceeds the crop of any other state.

Lyman Abbott, dealing with the negro problem in a recent lecture, has these sensible words, "It is a mistake to believe every people can vote. . . . There should be drawn, not a color or race line, but a character line. Booker T. Washington should not be refused a ballot because his face is black, when an ignorant, incompetent, drunken white man is allowed the right of suffrage. Manhood must come first, suffrage afterwards."

Chalk Bluff has a new house, dedicated a few Sundays since by Addison Clark. This is a country church, that part of Texas which especially needs our work.

Bolling V. Walker has resigned the work at Teneha and accepted that of Arkadelphia, Ark.

Dr. Harsha is holding a meeting for the Presbyterians of Ft. Worth. His preaching sounds like that of our fathers in the early days of "our plea." His sermon on "Assurance" is wonderfully familiar. "It is the privilege of all," he said, "to know that they are the children of God. In Plainfield, N. J., an old sea captain heard this subject discussed, and made this testimony, 'I have sailed out of New York harbor hundreds of times when my feelings told me Liverpool lay in a certain direction, but the compass told me that it was in just the opposite direction. If I had followed my feelings I should have run my ship on the Jersey sands. But I followed the compass and always came safely to the Mersey.' So with us. Do not trust your feelings. Follow the Bible and the Holy Spirit and you will come to anchor in the heavenly harbor."

Pecos has a new house. The small congregation deserves much credit. H. M. Baudy will preach for them.

Emanuel Dubbs has organized a church at Prospect and the prospect is good for a good work.

Brookston has a neat new church. James N. Crutcher, of Paris, has led this little band to victory. J. M. Biard will preach for them.

A. O. Riall, of Camden Point, Mo., will return to Texas. His absence of five years will be forgiven, if he will return and remain.

Alvin, whose house was destroyed in the great flood, is to rebuild. W. J. Haywood is pastor.

J. H. O. Smith and Prof. John Brown are assisting us in a meeting at the Central Church. Outlook good. First week 19 additions.

Alexander Campbell's Theology

By W. E. GARRISON. This book is a scientific statement according to the historical method of the religious and philosophical influences which molded the theological teaching of Mr. Campbell. Here are some extracts from reviews:

J. J. HALEY: "This book marks the beginning of a new epoch in our literature. . . . . I heartily commend it to the perusal of thoughtful men and women."

F. D. POWER: "A distinct and noteworthy contribution to our literature. It is a clear and comprehensive statement of a very important theme."

ERI B. HULBERT: "Readers whose desire it is to understand the theology which Mr. Campbell elaborated will find in this treatise exactly the information they are seeking."

A handsome volume of 302 pages, bound in cloth. Sent postpaid on receipt of price, $1.00.

THE CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING COMPANY, 1522 LOCUST STREET.

5 BOOKS for $1.00

The following works are paper-bound booklets. Each is a valuable treatise on the subject to which it is devoted—concise and dealing with the fundamental facts rather than microscopic detail. The price of each work singly is 25 cents. We will send the five books, postpaid, for One Dollar.

Christian Science Dissected. By A. D. Sector. This work, issued last summer, has already had a very large sale. It is bright, breezy, clear and convincing—just the thing to put into the hands of one who is inclining toward "Christian Science."

Sabbath or Lord's Day. By D. R. Dungan. Is it the First Day or the Seventh Day of the week that Christians should observe as a day of rest and worship? This book answers the question conclusively.

Facts About China. By W. Remfry Hunt. The author has lived in Central China for many years. His book is full of facts about Chinese customs, language, government, religions, commerce, geography, etc.

The Liquor Traffic. By S. W. Crutcher. Mr. Crutcher has spent years in fighting this traffic, and in this book tells of his experiences with manufacturers and dealers of whisky in the church and out.

Mission Study.

Our Lord's world-wide work has lingered long. But the dawn is upon us, and higher hopes were never given to any people. The Lord is blessing us at home. We are growing rapidly. Our barns and our store-houses are not empty. Beyond us lies the great world of pagan peoples; India, China and Japan are beckoning to us, and the isles are waiting for his law. In our home land there are growing multitudes as needy as the neediest in pagan lands, and by every right of truth and love and kinship, and by every hope for the future, they should be evangelized.

What hinders that our young men do not give their lives in multitudes for this glorious work, and that our people do not pour out their wealth upon the altars of our societies like rivers of oil? It is because they do not know. They do not see and feel and realize the calls of the Lord and his perishing multitudes. We are not lacking in consecration and generosity. But we lack knowledge. We need a campaign of education. We must be made to know and feel the world's need and the Lord's command.

It has been planned by the Bethany C. E. Reading Circle to devote the next three months exclusively to the study of missions, and it is urged that these readings be taken up systematically in all our congregations during that time. The handbooks for this study have been prepared especially for our own people. They are brief, clear, comprehensive and inexpensive. They are entitled "Handbook of Missions," "Missionary Fields and Forces of the Disciples" and "Heroes of Modern Missions." J. Z. Tyler, of 798 Republic St., Cleveland, Ohio, will place them in the hands of any one at the rate of 35 cents each or three for $1.00. This barely covers expenses. We urge pastors to organize circles at once in every congregation, including old as well as young; to deliver lectures on missionary topics and to devote at least one prayer-meeting each month to this majestic theme. The pastors are the men of God to whom the Lord himself must look for leadership in the mighty work.

Director of Study of Missions in Bethany Reading Courses.

We desire to give to the foregoing appeal our most hearty endorsement. It is of the utmost importance. Its plan is admirable. The diffusion of missionary intelligence is the fundamental need of the hour. Who can forecast the ultimate results of a prompt and widespread response to this urgent appeal? We beseech our pastors, by the divinest considerations, to respond to it at once.

A Worthy Pioneer.

Allen Hickey, of Des Moines, is now the oldest pioneer preacher in Iowa, he having begun to preach in Boone county, Iowa, in 1859. He was the editor and publisher of the Evangelist in its early day. He is still active, and will celebrate his golden wedding April 13th. A reception is being arranged at University Place Church of Christ. All brethren reading this notice are invited to write some reminiscences of their acquaintance with him, the same to be edited for a memorial to him on that day. He has toiled without adequate recompense, and if brethren and friends of the cause which he has loved and served so well wish to send a substantial expression of sympathy, J. B. Burton, of University Place, will receive such and will present the same on that day. Let this worthy man of God know the deep appreciation his brethren feel for the work he has done. I. N. MCCASH.

The Situation at Bradford, Pa.

We have about 25 Disciples here and I am trying to get them to organize and get a good, strong man to preach our plea. I am positive a strong church can be established and with comparatively little effort. We have the promised co-operation of the state missionary society. One of the leading ministers here said to-day: "I am about convinced that your church is the right one, and if you bring an evangelist here you will receive my co-operation." Since last September this brother has been presenting much that we contend for; result, over 100 additions, and he states the power has been in the simple gospel. He is being greatly criticized because he will not sprinkle, and may be brought before his conference. We desire the prayers of the brethren on our efforts to establish in the "wickedest town in Pennsylvania" the Church of Christ.

Los Angeles Letter.

Southern California takes pride in another church house set apart for the use of a Church of Christ in the worship of God. On Lord's day, March 10, 1901, I preached the dedicatory sermon in the new church house at Santa Paula. The structure has an audience room that will seat comfortably about 225 persons, a Sunday-school connected by folding doors that will accommodate 75 persons, two class rooms and upstairs a large parlor. It is splendidly adapted for the work of that church. Provision for the indebtedness against the building was made excepting about $300. This amount will not prove a serious detriment to the work of the congregation. Great credit is due Brethren J. F. Stewart and Vail who have given much time to its construction and to W. J. Sheriff who has given largely of his funds for its completion. Brother Stewart, who for many years was an active preacher, but now lives on a ranch near Santa Paula, is to be credited with the erection of this church house. The membership is not large, not numbering much over thirty. They have called a pastor, C. P. Paun, who will enter upon the work at once. We expect to hear good reports from Santa Paula.

The First Church of this city, after long consideration of the question, has adopted the use of the individual cup in the administration of the Lord's supper. To say that our people are delighted with it is to put the matter mildly. In this age when microbes are so plentiful and people so fearful many find much less spiritual comfort in the cup than they ought. The individual cup removes all these objections and makes the observance of the supper a joy to many when heretofore they have found it an anxiety and a disturbance. I would commend its use to all our churches.

The First Church has recently organized a Men's Sunday Evening Club. The purpose of the club is to look after the social and religious interests of the men of the church and vicinity. The men are the neglected ones in our churches. We have abundant organizations for all other classes, while we neglect the men. This accounts very largely, as I believe, for the absence of so many men from religious services. Let us get the men into our churches and we shall be able to reach their entire families. It is believed that the Men's Club will prove a useful factor in that direction.

I wish we might be able to impress upon our church members the necessity of fidelity to the church whether at home or abroad. Situated as I am in a far western city, I am overwhelmed and chagrined at the number of people who were affiliated with our churches in the eastern states, but who have not even made themselves known since coming to Los Angeles. A recent religious canvass has demonstrated that quite as many Disciples in Los Angeles are not affiliated with the churches as are found in the membership of our congregations. I should be glad if this embarrassing and perplexing condition might be overcome. Perhaps a little preaching and editorial writing on this question might be useful in the matter of bringing people to a consciousness of duty along this line. We need more of the esprit de corps among us. Perhaps we have grown too strong and too popular. Let us never forget our obligations to the great plea of our forefathers.

J. E. Wilson, of Chadron, is in a meeting with B. A. Wilkinson at Gordon. He reports one added at Chadron on the 10th.

A. W. Henry was compelled to close the Wakefield meeting on account of smallpox. They were getting a good start. He reports the work there as in excellent condition under the wise leadership of Bro. and Sister J. B. White.

H. H. Rama, pastor at Blair, has been working up the congregation at Kennard, which has been for some time inactive. He organized with 15, and has since started a Bible-school. A Christian Endeavor Society will follow. He is expected to begin a meeting at Elwood on the 25th.

Information comes that R. M. Harris has been prospecting with a view to locating at Valparaiso. He is now filling the pulpits at Rising City and Summit.

One more Lord's day in March in which to take the offering for the foreign work. Let me urge the Nebraska churches to be prompt in this matter and forward the collection during the month some time.

District conventions will soon be the order of the day or weeks. No. 4 begins on March 27. No. 1 comes to Salem April 8-11. I notice that the disposition is to make the sessions a little longer than formerly, beginning on Monday night frequently and closing on Thursday night. I believe the district conventions should discuss the need of paying the expenses of the district secretary to at least three board meetings during the year. It happens frequently that the secretary cannot well afford the expense of attending these meetings, and as a result we have only a limited few in attendance. It would not be burdensome on the districts to shoulder this expense and thus insure that the interests of the district will be well represented at the board meetings. This would be especially helpful to the corresponding secretary and the whole board in deciding on the proper work to be done in any district. Where there are two or three applications in, when only one can be granted, it is essential that a wise choice be made, and this can be greatly facilitated by the district secretaries. I urge the attention of districts to this matter.

The big tent was hauled to Cotner and stored in the university building. It is hoped to have it in continuous use during the summer.

"Undenominational Christianity."

In an article under this head the Rev. Charles H. Small, pastor of First Congregational Church of Springfield, O., in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of March 7, says:

"In an extended study of the denominations in the United States I have failed to find any company of people that do not have some feature that is exclusive, i. e., that do not have some belief or practice that excludes other sincere Christians."

Sometimes the thing for which we are looking afar off is very nigh to us, and I wish to say to our brother Small that the "company of people" does exist, and worships in a building not four squares from where he preaches every Sunday. With them Christian character is the only test of fellowship, and the Holy Bible is their only creed.

The Christian who has received water baptism in any form, or the one who, like the Friends, believes only in the baptism of the Holy Ghost, is alike received in full fellowship. They believe "in essentials unity, in non-essentials liberty, in all things charity." I would advise, in a spirit of love, that our Brother Small search out this body of Christians in Springfield, that he may know more fully of them.

Thinks the wife, to have the wedding ring slip from the finger. "Something is going to happen."

Something is happening. That ring could hardly be pulled from the finger when it was put there a few years ago. Now it slips off by its own weight. How thin the fingers have grown! And the fingers don't grow thin alone. How thin the face is and how thin the once plump form. Almost unconsciously the wife has been fading and wasting away. The strength given to children has never been regained. Drains which should have been stopped have been neglected.

That is a common experience with women, unless some friend has shared with them the secret of the strengthening and healing power of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It regulates the periods, dries the drains which undermine the strength, heals inflammation and ulceration, and cures female weakness. It makes the baby's advent practically painless and gives vigor and vitality to nursing mothers.

"Words cannot tell how grateful I am for your kind advice and good medicines," writes Mrs. John Cooke, of Hastings, Northumberland Co., Ontario. "I have been in poor health for four years back and this spring got so bad I could not do my work. I went to the doctor and he said I had ulceration and falling of the internal organs, but thought I would try your 'Favorite Prescription.' I took five bottles and three of the 'Golden Medical Discovery' and one vial of Dr. Pierce's Pellets, and I can safely say that I never felt better in my life."

Kansas State Mission Notes.

The Congregationalists of Kansas through their missionary society gained five members per missionary last year. The Baptists gained 19 per missionary. The Christian churches gained 30 per missionary last year.

Think of it!

But, the Congregationalists of Kansas gave an average of thirty cents per member for state missions last year. The Baptists gave an average of ten cents per member for state missions. The members of the Christian churches gave an average of five cents per member for state missions last year.

Think of THIS also!

Again, the Congregationalists made a net gain of but eight members last year in Kansas. The Baptists made a net gain of twenty-five. The Christian churches made a net gain of nearly one thousand. Think intently and draw the moral.

The brotherhood of Kansas will be pleased to learn that our receipts for Kansas missions thus far this year go about $400 beyond the same period for last year. This argues much for the quarterly payment plan which was recommended at our last state convention. While this does not prove that our annual receipts will be any larger in the aggregate than they were last year, it does show that there will be a more even distribution of our offerings.

But, brethren, we must raise more money than last year. At the last meeting of our state board it was shown that we had already gone beyond last year's appropriations almost $500. This amount at least must be raised. Yet when this is done many, many appeals must go unanswered.

The second quarter of our missionary year closes with March. One half of the yearly apportionments should be in from each department of the churches. Don't neglect this, brethren and sisters. Our missions are all prospering. They are manned by careful, capable men. One has become self-supporting, Oakley. Great Bend will get that appropriation this year.

And now, between the time for the offering for foreign missions and the May offering for home missions, let every one give heed to state missions and get the second quarter's apportionments all cleared up.

W. S. LOWE.

1221 Clay St., Topeka, Kas.

Virginia Notes.

Spray, N. C., has secured the services of C. E. Elmore and we are left without an evangelist in this district.

G. W. Glascoche recently held one meeting for us at Dyer Store and will hold one at a mission next week. At Dyer Store C. E. Elmore opened the fire. The churches were closed against him and much opposition was manifested on the part of the Old Baptists. A saloon-keeper invited him to preach in his house, which he did. Glascoche organized a Sunday-school, the first, I suppose, ever in that community, and arranged to purchase a house of worship.

At Mt. Olivet the work is growing. They have an excellent Sunday-school.

Our offering here for the foreign work surprised the natives. The people in this part of the state are not wild with enthusiasm over foreign work or the heathen abroad. They say we have heathen at home. "Free gospel," "Election visions and dreams and tales of experiences," mixed with red liquor, have all had much to do in shaping a dead conscience on the subject of missions. This church has given $60, more than double any previous offering, and more is yet to come. This year we will give not less than $100 to this work.

With open arms and hearts we receive Albert Buxton, C. P. Williamson, Atkins and I. Bauserman to the state. Grand men. Buxton goes to Norfolk, Williamson to Marshall street, Richmond, Atkinson to East End Church and Bauserman to Crewe.

B. C. Smith, who has been spending the winter in Asheville, N. C., has returned to work at Charlottesville.

G. W. Glascoche, who has done a most excellent work in this district, has resigned and is open for engagements.

The church at Danville is out of debt and J. W. Spencer will give all of his time to that work.

The state board is corresponding with a live man for Chatham and Oldwell and a part of his time to be given to this district as evangelist.

W. G. Walters is so full of energy that he not only preaches for the church at Winston but finds time to evangelize. He now assisting C. E. Elmore at Spray.

C. O. Woodward and W. J. Coche recently held good meetings in Shenandoah valley. Sorry to lose J. C. Reynolds. He goes to Montgomery, W. Va.

I learn that the churches at Wytheville and Pulaski are without preachers.

R. W. Lilly will soon begin a meeting at Salem.

C. E. Morgan is having a prosperous work at Seventh street, Richmond. He is a power in any church.

I. Chestnut has accepted the work at Fredericksburg.

P. A. Cone declined the call to the Third Church, Richmond.

F. F. Bullard reports additions at Lynchburg quite often.

I. D. Hamaker has accepted the work at Woodstock. W. H. BOOK.

Martinsville, Va.

Northwestern Ohio.

The writer feels pleased to say that his health has recuperated somewhat, especially since la grippe has loosed its tight grip upon me.

During the last two months supplied pulpits at Hicksville, Beaverdam, Pandora, Eagleville and Milton Center, and am booked to be at two more places. Health remaining I propose to be ready to do supply work in the future. Hence would say to brethren if a supply is needed in these parts of Ohio I will be ready to respond.

My son, John William Bolton, now minister at Sweet Valley and Huntsville, Pa., proposes to return to Ohio, and will be ready to assume charge of a work if needed in northwest Ohio. He has had about ten years' experience in the gospel ministry.

The church at Findlay is moving forward; six additions recently. Bro. W. A. Brundige, of Lima, O., was called by his own sister to baptize her on the night of Feb. 26th. The church here has an enrolled membership of about 500. We ought to have a local mission here. It would give new life to the church. All large city churches and many others should have missions. The church raised over $100 for foreign mission work. The C. W. B. M. mission has a membership of 47. It raised about $80 for missions the past year.

The greater part of the churches of Christ in northwest Ohio have enjoyed encouraging revivals of religion. Churches have been spiritually quickened and souls have been added to their numbers.

It was my pleasure to attend the sessions of the nineteenth district convention of the Disciples of Christ at Weston, O., on March 12th and 13th. The sessions were well attended by delegates and people of the community. The program, covering various phases of missionary, Bible-school and C. E. work, was followed out, which made the convention full of enthusiasm and interest. Addresses as a rule were able and earnest. Bro. S. H. Bartlett, state secretary, who is a real "hustler," was present and helped add interest to the convention, as well as Bro. Q. A. Randall, of Moscow, O., who gave us several helpful talks.

The reports of both state and district secretaries manifested aggressive Christian work and also that much remains to be done. The field is ripe for the harvest. More consecrated men and means are needed to carry forward the work.

Dr. S. M. Cook is pastor of the churches of Christ at Weston and Antioch, and we heard many praiseworthy words touching his life and labors.

The adjournment took place, "good-byes" were said and we parted to meet in annual meeting next October at Elmore, Sandusky county, Ohio.

These conventions are helpful, the fellowship enjoyable, and should be attended more largely by our brethren. Cannot well afford to miss them. R. H. BOLTON.

Updike in strong, plain teaching will be stimulating to the church and the community, and will result in permanent good.—F. W. COLLINS, pastor.

Olin, March 22.—Four weeks' meeting closed Mar. 19. Ten additions to the church. This record imperfectly represents the great benefit accruing from Bro. J. M. Lowe's labors with us. His preaching was strong, earnest and effective. We count the meeting a marked success.—S. J. CARTER, pastor.

MISSOURI.

Brookfield, March 18.—J. R. and R. W. Blunt closed a meeting at Lucerne, Mo., on March 15; 29 were added during the meeting, nine by confession. We organized a congregation on the last night and appointed a committee to see what could be done toward a new house. R. W. Blunt will preach for them for a year We try to stand by our children until they can walk. R. W. will soon be giving three-fourths of his time to work that "we have built from the ground." Mrs. Corda Blunt, the wife of R. W. Blunt, will join him at Laclede next week, where he will hold a short meeting. After that they will live at Harris, Mo. J. R. goes to Richland. Pulaski county, Mo., to begin a meeting on the fourth Lord's day in March.—J. R. BLUNT.

Canton, March 15.—I just closed a two weeks' meeting at Coatsburg, Ill., in which were 18 additions; 10 by confession and baptism, five by letter and three from the Baptist Church. This meeting ended my first year's work at Coatsburg. The entire year's work results in 23 added to the church. I begin my second year's work at Coatsburg next month—CHAS. L. HARBORD.

Carthage, March 18.—Four additions recently; two confessions, a young married man and a young lady, unmarried; two by letter —W. A. OLDHAM.

Hopkins, March 20.—We had large audiences and six added here Lord's day at our regular services; church prosperous. I have a lecture on the "Oberammergau Passion Play," which I saw Sept. 23, 1900, and am giving it at the rate of 50 per cent. of proceeds to churches or societies desiring it.—LEE FURGESON.

Hume, March 18.—I began a meeting here Lord's day, the 16th. Good audiences. Hope for good results.—E. J. LAMPTON, state evangelist.

Kirksville, March 12.—There were 13 additions to the church here Sunday night, and six Monday night.—H. A. NORTHCUTT.

Springfield, March 20.—J. V. Coombs was with the First Church 26 days. Closed our meeting March 10; 21 added—nine confessions. One confession last Lord's day.—E. W. BOWERS.

Summer, March 21.—Bro. T. J. VanHorn, Tina, Mo., who was just recently called to this congregation, has successfully conducted a three weeks' meeting, closing Monday night with six baptisms. The total number of additions to the church was 30; 15 by confession and baptism and 15 by statement. We feel that we have been very fortunate in securing the services of Bro. VanHorn, as he is a speaker of no small ability and is possessed of that personal magnetism that holds the attention of his audience. He won the love and esteem of not only his church, but of the entire community, and we anticipate a prosperous year.—JOSEPH A. KLEPPER, clerk.

NEBRASKA.

York, March 18.—Bro. M. L. Anthony, of Altamont, and Bro. L. O. Routh, of Civil Bend, Mo., closed a two weeks' meeting here last evening, resulting in 15 accessions as visible results and the community stirred to a better knowledge of the truth. The city and community talk about us as never before. Our house was much too small to seat all who wished to hear, and no doubt had the church building been larger the additions would have been many more. The church here learned to much love these men of God who so devotedly preach and sing the gospel truth. We hope these brethren enjoyed their visit to Nebraska and will come to our state again. We expect to enlarge our place of worship this spring. The Lord bless the CHRISTIAN-REGISTER.—GEO. J. CHAPMAN.

Champion, March 16.—C. P. Evans, of Arapahoe, Neb., just closed a short meeting here. Though the weather was bad and we had many things to interfere, the meeting was not void of results. Bro. Evans is a man of ability and though somewhat advanced in years, his knowledge of the Scriptures and long experience has made him a power in the world. If any reader of this article thinks that an aged man should be retired because of age, I suggest that you get him for a meeting and be undeceived. His present ability is now equal to most young men and his experience renders him capable of great things yet.—D. M. SAYLES, pastor.

Fairfield, March 18.—There have been 63 additions to the church here since our work began in December last. Bros. M. L. Anthony and L. O. Routh, of Missouri, conducted a good meeting for us with 51 net additions to the church in February.—L. AA. HUSSONG, pastor.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Troy, March 18.—Four baptisms last night and one confession last Thursday night at prayer-meeting. This makes 20 accessions by baptism and four by letter since May 1, 1900. Just recently closed a two weeks' meeting at E. Smithfield, Pa , where I assisted Bro. L. J. Reynolds, with 17 confessions.—E. F. RANDALL.

Wertmoor, Pa., March 23.—Our meeting of 25 days' duration closed with 40 confessions and 4 by statement. Bro. J. D. Dabney, of Dunmore, Pa., did the preaching. He was the right man for the place. We all love him for the noble work he did for us. The church was organized March 11, 1900, with 19 members and it increased to 42 members by Feb. 25, 1901. The membership now is 88.—C. A. FRICH, pastor.

TEXAS.

San Antonio, Mar. 18.—Three by letter and one by confession at regular services yesterday; services every night this week with home forces. Our city is enjoying a genuine religious revival, nearly every Protestant church in the city joining in concerted effort at their respective churches.—GEO. B. RANSHAW.

Weatherford, Mar. 18.—Our meeting continues with increasing interest, 19 additions to date, 6 from Baptist —J. L. HADDOCK.

Heavy Losses for Foreign Missions.

Comparing the receipts for foreign missions for the week ending March 21 with the corresponding week in 1900 shows the following distressing losses:

	1900	1901	Loss
No. of Contrib. Churches	570	368	202
Amounts	$10,672,46	$7,713,24	$2,959,22

For the past two weeks we have been compelled to make the most discouraging reports in the history of the society. What is the cause? Will not the friends and churches rally to the support of the work at once? We urge the churches to forward their offerings at the earliest possible moment. We can yet regain the lost ground if all help. Please act at once. F. M. RAINS, Cor. Sec.

Increase Our Faith.

By A. R. Adams.

Increase our faith, O blessed Lord,
That we may trust thee every hour;
May we rely upon thy holy word
As heaven's only saving power.

Increase our faith that we may honor thee,
And pour our treasures at the feet
Of him who gave his life that we Might taste salvation full and sweet.

Increase our faith that we may see,
Through mists that veil these mortal eyes,
The home above prepared by thee,
Beyond this world of tears and sighs.

The Lessons of a Pure Life.

BY WM. GRANT SMITH.

[In memory of Ex-president Harrison.]

Addressing a delegation of young men Gen. Harrison said: "If I were to select a watchword that I would have every young man write above his door, and in his heart, it would be that good word fidelity." Mr. Harrison's whole public and private life was an exemplification of that watchword.

This was the keynote of his character. Among the commendable traits of his life worthy of imitation by all, and containing helpful lessons for the young are:

1. Purity of Life.—His life was so unsullied and unstained that even in the heat of political campaigns no political enemy could drag his name in the mire. He lived on high levels. His life was inspired by high ideals, and aspirations not only high but holy.

When he came as a young man to Indianapolis, he did what every young man ought to do, allied himself with good people and right things.

2. His Christian Life.—Among our presidents, Gen. Garfield and Gen. Harrison have been conspicuous examples of faithful attendance at the church service. What Garfield did for the Vermont Avenue Church, Harrison would have done for the church of his faith under similar circumstances. Inspired always by responsibility to and love for God, he thought Christianity called for an earnest, active religious life.

No man ever became president who did not recall infant prayers lisped at a Christian mother's knee. Not the title "Czar" and the enmity it implied, but rather his pronounced opposition to Christianity closed the doors of Tom Reed's presidential aspirations and deprived Ingersoll of many political honors. Harrison was proud of the call to preside at the Ecumenical Conference, "to associate oneself with the most influential and enduring work that is being done in this day of great enterprise."

3. Fidelity to Home was one of his prominent characteristics. During the second presidential campaign he was with his sick wife, ministering to her necessities. In public and private life he exalted the home, "in which morality, purity and love sit as the crowning virtues, and as household gods." He said, "The American home is the one thing we cannot afford to lose out of American life." His home was to him—

"the spot of earth supremely blest,
A dearer, sweeter spot than all the rest."

4. His Ideals of Statesmanship.—These ideals are eminently worthy of imitation. He was not a politician in the ordinary sense of the word, but a broad-minded, logical, deep thinker, who aimed at the greatest good. In a message to Congress he said, "Seek that general legislation which touches with kindly fingers the humblest homes in our land." His mind was not shallow, selfish, or little in any respect. He used it not as a barn to be stored with knowledge, but as a fertile field to be cultivated with the tools of God-given possession.

5. His patriotism was manifested by his heroic, valiant service under the flag, by his unceasing interest in all public questions and his association with the benevolent and charitable societies of his own city. He was a good type of the ideal American citizen.

Purity of life, his Christianity, his fidelity to home, his ideals of statesmanship, patriotism and good citizenship, were not enough to account for his reaching the heights of enduring fame. Back of it all, underlying all as a deep foundation, was his fidelity to work, to an unceasing, patient, methodical industry that characterized his whole eventful life.

Native ability must be supplemented by the habit of industry.

He ended his life at the summit of American honors, the peer of the greatest in the galaxy of American statesmen. His well-rounded and completed life, symmetrical and foursquare, furnishes to the youth of to-day one of the best of modern examples worthy of imitation.

In conclusion, let me quote Gen. Harrison again. "I am a thorough believer in the American test of character. The rule must be applied to a man's own life when his stature is taken. He will not build high who does not build for himself."

Delphi, Ind.

Family Jars.

By Arielle Pickett.

"Jonanth will be trying to run the place before long. The idea of his trying to teach me how to act at church! The young scamp! I'll teach him he'd better behave in the church of his fathers!" and John Bull drew out his handkerchief to wipe the prespiration from his ruddy face. John Bull had always been somewhat tyrannical with his son, who had finally run off to a distant plantation owned by his father. Jonanth found the soil good, but overrun with trees and underbrush. He went to tilling the soil at once.

Before long he met Liberty, with whom he at once proceeded to fall in love; but being bashful, and also rather afraid of his father, who fairly raged upon hearing of his even seeing her, he only glanced at her over his shoulder at first. Jonanth, at last, unknown to his father, married her. However, John Bull suspected what was going on, and was very severe, not allowing Jonanth to have any dealings with his neighbors, or even to cut down a tree without permission. Meanwhile, Jonanth began to have quite a family, in which he took a great deal of pride.

When New York just donned knickerbockers he was the joy of the family. Jonanth decided to be more liberal than his father had been, so he gave each of his children a farm.

Massachusetts one day met with what she thought to be a witch, and was badly frightened.

At last John Bull refused his son any tea, unless he paid extra for it. Jonanth one evening upset the tea canister and refused to drink tea any longer. He also decided to make public announcement of his marriage to Liberty. So one July day he told his father of his marriage, and the children celebrated the day by ringing a great bell. But this only increased John Bull's wrath, and he declared he would thrash Jonanth into submission. Jonanth called all of his children to him and explained to them that he would have them help him keep the estate which his father intended taking from him. They answered:

"Come the wild weather, come sleet, come snow;
We'll stand by each other however it blow."

Jonanth convinced his father, after a severe struggle, that he could take care of himself.

Some time after this, Texas had trouble over a line fence between his farm and Mexico's. Jonanth soon convinced neighbor Mexico that his son was right, and also gained more land for his rapidly increasing family. When Louisiana desired a farm, he bought a piece of land from neighbor France, who had been very kind during his trouble with his father.

Utah had some strange ideas in his head about having as many wives as he pleased, and as Jonanth refused to countenance such behavior, he settled in the western part of the estate.

When the family had grown very large, there was a dispute among them about work. Some of the children were willing to do their own work, but the others insisted upon some one else doing their work for them. Jonanth had never been lazy, and he refused to allow his children that privilege. One of the twins, Carolina, intended having her own way, and would not obey her father. Others followed her example. Jonanth believed that "discipline must be maintained," and so, although he was very sorry for their disobedience, for the sake of the entire family he administered a severe chastisement. Soon after this affair had been properly adjusted, he bought land from his acquaintance by the name of Russia, for his daughter, Alaska.

After a number of happy years had passed by, he observed Spain imposing upon Cuba. Jonanth's sympathies being aroused, he spoke kindly to Spain, but he haughtily turned his back and went on treating poor Cuba badly, and had her on the verge of starvation when Jonanth sent supplies, which were destroyed. Thereupon Jonanth resolved to teach Spain a lesson, which he did so effectively that Cuba was left alone. Jonanth now adopted Cuba, along with some other destitute children, but finds that other people's children are not as manageable as his own.—Watchword.

A Sewing Society Episode.

By Kate Warthen Searcy.

The Sewing Society was in session at the parsonage. A momentous hush had fallen upon its members, so that the click of scissors and the snipping of threads were the only sounds made. Then Myra Ann Overton sighed audibly. A responsive sigh came from the fourteen other members in that room as a voice called from the adjoining apartment:

"Sisters, what makes you all so still in there?"

"We are collectively and individually reflecting upon our own unpremeditated wickedness," replied Myra Ann, who was always quick to speak.

The minister's wife came to the door. "Tell me about it," she said. "It must be interesting," and she smiled at the queer look on their faces.

"In short, 'tis this," said Myra Ann. "We had drifted into talking about people, as we commonly do, you know. Somehow we have not seemed to notice how much we have been drifting that way lately. I made a remark criticising old Mrs. Brinscombe. She's that funny old creature who always used to carry a tin pail full of sandwiches about with her to feed to hungry-looking boys. To tell the truth, I was making fun of her, when Mrs. Brown said, right low and awestruck like, 'She's dead, old Mrs. Brincombe is, didn't you know it? Died last night.' And I didn't know it—at least I hadn't known until then." Myra Ann paused. Her voice had been trembling toward the last. She did not want it to break entirely, so she paused and ostentatiously bit at a tangle in her thread.

"Not many of the rest of us knew of it, either," added Lillian Heathly. "We laughed at what Myra Ann said and were ready to make more fun, as usual. Mrs. Brown's remark struck us hard. You know how bad a body feels to be saying hard things of an absent person and all at once be told that person is dead. Well, that's the way we felt, all of us." Lillian paused and bent low to pick out some faulty stitches. Her voice had begun to tremble also.

"The main thing that made us so silently introspective, though," said calm little Mrs. Murray, "was an admonition by the president just following what has been told you. She said, 'My sisters, the shock we feel ought to be experienced in some degree every time a person is ridiculed in our presence. Let us, after this, say to ourselves on such occasions, "Some time she, too, will be dead." It may be a somewhat melancholy reminder, but a salutary one.'"

"You see we think our president is right," said another member, with a bright little laugh. "Hereafter we shall refrain from derogatory remarks of one another, saying to ourselves, 'Some time she will die and then we'll be sorry.' And when in a company of backbiters we shall restrain our own tongues and say, 'She may not be dead now, but some time she will be.'"

"In short," said Myra Ann, "it shall be our aim to speak as respectfully of the living as of the dead."

The minister's wife smiled approval and went back to her work in the adjoining room. None of the industrious sewers knew how her eyes ran over with tears and her heart throbbed with joy that anything had come to pass which promised to lessen the dreadful evil she had seen throttling her beloved Sewing Society.

Made a Fool of Himself.

Rev. A. T. Howard, our United Brethren Missionary Superintendent in Japan, in the February Search Light relates this incident, showing how God uses sincere efforts:

"One hot morning last July I was walking along a country road with Rev. Mr. Jones, of the Baptist mission. Mr. Jones has been in Japan about fifteen years, and has had an interesting experience. We met a Japanese Christian, and stopped to speak with him a few minutes. When we started on Mr. Jones said, 'That man's first interest in Christianity was peculiar,' and I answered, 'Yes,' with that peculiar emphasis which, as Bob Burdette says, asks for more. Mr. Jones went on to explain that when he first came to Japan he was anxious to use his knowledge of Japanese as soon as possible. At a meeting he tried to pray, a difficult undertaking, but his success was not remarkable. A number of years afterward he became better acquainted with the Japanese gentleman whom he had just passed, and the man said, 'Do you know what first seriously turned my attention to Christianity?' Mr. Jones replied, 'No.' The man said, 'I heard you try to pray at a public meeting, and thought if a man was willing to go to a foreign country and make such a fool of himself as you did, he must have good reason for it.'"

The Burned Book.

Bepin's home was away in a village in India. He had a friend, by name Atul, who went to a school kept by missionaries in a town a short distance off.

At the time of which I am writing, this boy had just come back for the holidays, bringing with him a Christian book. Bepin spied it at once, and asked what it was.

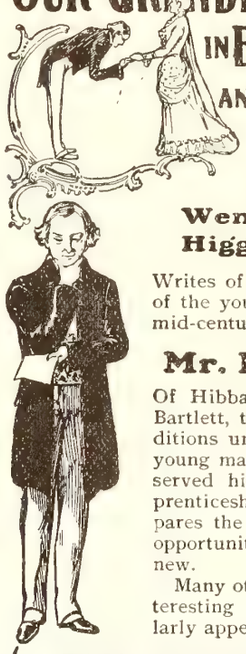
"It is the book the missionary gave me."

"Let me look at it," said Bepin.

Little Atul was far too much afraid of Bepin to refuse to give it up, so he handed him the gospel.

Bepin turned over the leaves and then threw it straight into the fire on which their food was cooking, saying, "That is the best place for Christian books."

Atul ran away, and left his companion watching the book burn. Only a part of it caught alight, and it struck Bepin that it looked as though it was very nice printing.



"It is a pity to burn such good print as that," he thought. "I think I had better look at it." So, suiting the action to the word, he snatched the burning book out of the fire, blew out the flames, and turned it over again.

Now came the crisis. His eye caught some words which he thought beautiful. He was like one arrested; there he stood, reading on and on. Something in the volume seemed so new and strange. Reading the story of the life of Jesus for the first time, his heart was touched. He put the charred book safely away, with the intention of giving to it careful study.

After a time he got new copy, and not only read it himself, but persuaded other young men in the village to read it, too, and as they read their ideas began to change. Soon they felt that it was no longer possible to lie and cheat as they did formerly; they longed more and more to grow like Jesus, and if you went to India, and visited the right place, you might see—what? Bepin himself, with a crowd of dark-faced men and boys listening as he tells them of the great love of Jesus.

The book, in its own silent way, had preached to him so effectually that he was born again. A wonderful book is the Bible.—Selected.

Training to Work Prevents Crime.

"What per cent. of the prisoners under your care have received any manual training beyond some acquaintance with farming?" a northern man asked the warden of a southern penitentiary.

"Not ONE per cent," replied the warden.

"Have you no mechanics in prison?"

"Only one mechanic; that is, one man who claims to be a house-painter."

"Have you any shoemakers?" asked the visitor.

"Never had a shoemaker."

"Have you any tailors?"

"Never had a tailor."

"Any printers?"

"Never had a printer."

"Any carpenters?"

"Never had a man in this prison that could draw a straight line."

"These facts," says the writer in the North American Review who tells the incident, "seem to show that manual training is almost as good a preventive of crime as is vaccination of smallpox."

Hatred.

It is best to think twice before taking upon us the burden of hatred for any fellow-being. It weighs heavier every year, and exhausts the strength that ought to go in loving and bettering others instead. —Wellspring.

Purity.

Be pure, my child; live like a fragrant flower;
So when the Master looketh down on thee,
Be it in day or hour,
He may, beholding thee, be glad in thee.
Look thou to heaven, and so above thy head
The radiant wings of angels shall be spread
And in the hallowed glory that they shed
Thou shalt grow fair.
See that thy Father may have joy in thee,
For in this world is naught more fair to see
Than one fair soul in perfect purity;
So shall he have thee in his guard and care;
Meet for his garden, thou shalt blossom there.

Advice to a Borrower.

Secretary Gage is a man of affable manner, but he has had too much experience in finance to be an easy "touch" for confidence operators. He was approached recently, says the Saturday Evening Post, by a well-dressed man who greeted him effusively and began:

"I trust you will parpon me, Mr. Secretary, but I represent a London illustrated newspaper which has commissioned me to obtain a set of photographs of your country seat. Have you any objection to my taking a few views there?"

"None in the world," answered the secretary amiably, "if you will tell me where my country seat is. I never knew I had one."

"Ah!" exclaimed the stranger, "I must have been misinformed. Then, would you consent to my taking some pictures of the interior of your mansion in Washington?"

"With all the pleasure in life, if there were any house in the city that I could call my own. I live in a rented dwelling, and my landlord has notified me that I must get out of that in a few weeks."

In spite of his air of assurance, the stranger began to look embarrassed. Drawing a trifle nearer to Mr. Gage, and dropping his voice several degrees, he said:

"The fact is, Mr. Secretary, I am a little short of funds this morning. There are two leading publishers in England who are owing me money, and I thought possibly that you, as a banker and business man, could advise me how to proceed."

"I should think your best plan would be to draw on your debtors."

"Quite so. But you see, it costs a good deal to send the advices by cable."

"That is true. Under the circumstances you had better send your messages 'collect.'"

"Of course, of course." By this time the insinuating stranger was beginning to mop his brow. "There again, however, I am confronted by a little difficulty. The cable company has refused to send both dispatches 'collect.'"

"Has it?" asked the secretary with a look of real concern. "Well, then, my friend, it seems to me that you are reduced to a single course of conduct. Send one dispatch 'collect,' and get your money from that; out of the proceeds you can prepay the other."

And with a bow and a smile Mr. Gage disappeared through the swinging doors of the Treasury building.

The New War-Ships.

In the presence of most of the great shipbuilders and many of the metal kings of the country, the Secretary of the Navy opened bids for what he himself described as "the greatest industrial undertaking this or any other country has ever seen."

The bids were for the building of eleven new war-vessels, involving the expenditure of nearly fifty million dollars.

Five of the vessels are to be battle-ships, six armored cruisers. Battle-ships take their names from the states, and the five vessels of that class will be known as the Pennsylvania, the New Jersey, the Georgia, the Virginia and the Rhode Island. They are of two kinds. Three will be sheathed and coppered, and will carry superposed, or two-story, turrets. The other two will be unsheathed, and will have the quadrilateral arrangement of turrets.

The sheathed vessels will be four hundred and thirty-five feet long, and of fifteen thousand tons displacement. The unsheathed, although of the same length, will be of four hundred tons less displacement. Each will have a speed of nineteen knots an hour, which will place them among the fastest battle-ships in the world.

The armored cruisers are to be five hundred and two feet long. Their displacement will be somewhat less than that of the battle-ships, but their speed will be greater, the contracts providing for twenty-two knots. With great coal-carrying capacity and a correspondingly long radius of action, these swift cruisers combine many of the qualities of battle-ships, and represent a class unsurpassed in general effectiveness by vessels of any foreign navy.

For these important contracts there were nine bidders, among them several young firms, which showed themselves able to compete successfully with the older builders, to whom work of such magnitude has been almost exclusively awarded in the past. The distribution of the contracts among builders in Maine, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Virginia and California is significant of the growing resources of the country, and of the strength which might be drawn upon in a time of national need. —Youth's Companion.

The Coldest Spot on Earth.

The coldest known spot on the earth's surface is near Werkhojansk, Siberia. There, it is said, "the culminating point of excessive climate in all the world is reached." In other words, it is the pole of the greatest known cold. The lowest reading of the thermometer, taken by Sir George Nares, was noted there, 81 degrees below zero, Fahrenheit.

For a long time it was supposed that Yakutsk, 400 miles from Werkhopansk, was the coldest place in the world; recent observations, however, have exploded that nation. The soil at both of the places above mentioned is frozen to a depth of nearly 400 feet. It is believed to have been deposited in a frozen state during the glacial epoch as no amount of cold could penetrate the earth to such an enormous depth.

The Well-Rounded Life.

"Wouldn't it be fine to be as independent as Tom Fulton?" exclaimed a boy.

"Well, I'm not altogether sure," replied his companion, who was an older person. "Tom's independence saves him from a lot of mean little faults, and in itself it is a cardinal virtue. I dislike to criticise so noble a trait at all, yet I must say that Tom's independence at times comes perilously near to selfishness. He is so independent that he often fails to regard the feelings and rights of others."

We cannot drive straight through life, without regard to other people. Every virtue is beset by its opposite sin, and selfishness, or thoughtlessness, is the sin against which folks of an independent disposition should guard.

It is hard to keep virtues in proportion. We may become enamored of some excellence and pursue it blindly, with the result that, although we have attained it, we also have destroyed the balance of character. Symmetry of life is to be cultivated as assiduously as any other merit.—Forward.

It Came Back.

The Doctor's Wife Found Her Complexion Again.

Coffee is no respecter of persons when it comes to the poisonous effects thereof. A prominent physician's wife of Monticello, Ind., says that coffee treated her very badly indeed, giving her a serious and painful stomach trouble, and a wretched muddy complexion.

Her husband is a physician of the regular school and opposed to both tea and coffee, so he induced her to leave them off and take on Postum Food Coffee.

The stomach trouble disappeared almost like magic, and gradually her complexion cleared up; now she is in excellent condition throughout.

There are thousands of highly organized people who are made sick in a variety of different ways by the use of coffee, and most of these people do not suspect the cause of their trouble. They think that others can drink coffee and are well, and they can, but about one person out of every three is more or less poisoned by coffee and this can be proved by leaving off coffee and taking Postum Food Coffee. In nearly every case the disorder will be greatly relieved or entirely disappear. It is easy enough to make a trial and see whether coffee is a poison to you or not.

The name of the doctor's wife can be given upon application to the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

"Thank You."

Everybody likes little Carl Rosenbloom; he is so cunning and small and fat. He has lived in America just a little while, and he can speak only two English words; but it sounds so funny to hear him say, "Thank you," to whatever is said to him, that no one can help smiling; and I think this is the reason that he gets cookies and slices of gingerbread at every house where he is sent on an errand.

One day, Carl was trudging along with a basket of clothes which his mother had washed. He was a droll little figure, with his chubby legs and round, fat arms.

Some boys, playing marbles on the pavement, were quite amused at this comical sight, and they began to laugh and shout, "Sausage bags!"

Now, Carl did not understand a word, but he saw they were speaking to him, so he turned his dear little face to them with the sweetest of smiles and said, "Thank you."

You should have seen how ashamed the naughty boys looked then! One of them smiled and nodded at little Carl, another gave him a nice red apple, while another took his big basket and carried it for him.

So the good-natured little fellow trotted off, thinking what kind boys they were, and what a pleasant world this is to live in. And perhaps we should all think so, too, if our tempers were as sweet as his.—Sunday Afternoon.

The South Side.

"May I come in, dear?" called the girl's bright voice.

"Pull the bobbin and the latch will fly up," was the merry answer.

The girl pushed open the door and ran across the room to the bed. Nobody could have guessed the pain and the wearisome plaster cast from the cheery voice; still less could one have guessed that the need to earn made the weeks of pain still harder to bear. These things the woman lying there told to her God, never to her guests.

The girl held up a forlorn handful of late asters. "The very last" she declared. "I hunted and hunted!"

"Are you sure?" her friend asked quickly. "I've always found them later than this every year. Did you go over to the south side of the hill?"

"No," the girl confessed, laughingly. "I believe I looked on every side but that? I'll go straight back and hunt again.

Twenty minutes later she returned laden with autumn bloom.

"You were right," she said. "I had no idea that the south side made such a difference. The slope was half covered with the beautiful blossoms, so big and deep colored! I'm going to put them in this pitcher beside you so that you can reach your hands down deep into the autumn and pretend you're picking them yourself."

"Then," her friend returned, "I should have to give up the memory of somebody who picked them for me."

The girl stopped her pretty work. "Now I understand the difference!" she said, slowly. "You will insist, wilful woman that you are, in living on the south side of life, and getting every bit of sunshine there is, while most of us deliberately go and sit on the north side and grumble because it's cold! Never mind, I've caught your secret now, and I'm going to sit in the sun. Then maybe I'll blossom!"

The white face in the bed smiled. "And the best of it all is that there always is a south side," she answered—"the sun's side, and God's."—Presbyterian Review.

PETE.

XIV.—Candy.

When school was out for that day, Madge and Pete went home, when whom should they meet at their yard gate but Mr. Edgar Brown? Madge bowed politely as a girl bows to a grown-up person, and passed into the yard with her books. But Edgar called to her, "Madge, don't you and Pete want to entertain some company?" "Who are they?" asked the girl tentatively. "Me," said Edgar, entering the yard. Madge looked at Pete; "I think mamma is at home," she said quietly. "Come in." Now Madge knew very well that the young man did not want to call upon her mother. But this girl, this Madge Morris, was such a distant and reserved kind of person that it was all you could do to get to know her. She was polite to strangers and all that kind of thing, but she didn't think much of them. Pete was just the other way, at least if you could get her interested. And Linda May was more friendly to strangers than Pete, or would have been, had there been no Aunt Dollie. It made Edgar more anxious than ever to become Madge's friend, seeing how reluctant she was—because that's the way with a man. There was another reason. Somehow, Madge reminded him of that old sweetheart who was another's wife. And then, Madge was so dignified and quiet and sweet-faced, and her hair so soft, and her eyes so clear and innocent and womanly, you could see in her many of the qualities she would possess when she should be grown. And that made her all the dearer because now she was not grown, but had the white light of childhood shining in her face. She was thirteen. And there were times when that white light of childhood half-merged into a great luminous shadow that seemed thrown from an approaching future and then she was both girl and woman.

"I didn't come to see your mother," said Edgar," but I felt lonesome, and I thought maybe you and Pete would talk to me a little. And I brought some candy. Might I offer you some?" Being unused to children, Edgar was doubtful whether this was the proper thing. But Pete said at once, "What kind of candy is it? Let's see it." Madge was interested, also, and suggested that they sit on the front porch and pour it out on a newspaper and examine it. "I don't know what it is," said Edgar, his heart warming at their friendliness, "I just told the man to give me a dime's worth."

"Is that the way you buy candy?" said Pete with disapproval in her tone. "Hand me the sack. Madge, 'sno use to get a newspaper, 'sall one kind, cocoanut." "I don't want any, then," said Madge, promptly. They were seated on the edge of the porch. "I don't like cocoanut. Much obliged, though." "I don't like it either," said Pete, "but I'm going to eat it all the same; it's candy. What a little bit you got for a dime! You must have bought it at Griggs and Bimby's." Edgar said he didn't know the name of the store. "Didn't even know what store he bought it at!" exclaimed Pete. "Madge, ain't that a funny way to buy candy! Why, you go to Martin's next time. Say, I'll go with you and show you how. If that clerk with the big whiskers wants to wait on you, though, don't let him. He's as close—as you are to me!" "Yes," said Madge nodding emphatically, "don't you buy from him. Besides, you have to pick out your candy, or they'll think you don't know, and give you anything. Pete, I believe I will eat one piece—you keep crunching like it was good." "No," said Pete, "it ain't very good; it's a poor excuse, Madge. But if you spit out the cocoanut-strings, that's the best way. I wish I had a had the spending of that dime! I could get more than this for three pennies at Martin's, and it would be some account when I did get it." Now, most people would have objected to this free criticism; that is why most people have such a hard time getting into the true spirit of comradeship with young people. Grown people want children to be just like grown people, instead of enjoying them for what they are. Edgar Brown, as we have seen, was a queer young man. Well, he was delighted. He knew they were treating him just as if he were one of them, and he saw that this was the beginning of a real friendship. When they had said all they could against his candy (by which time they had eaten it all up), he told them the tramp would never come to the barn to disturb them again; in fact, he had left the country. "How do you know?" Madge asked. He told her that was a little secret, but he was sure they had seen the last of Nap. "Mamma will be so glad," cried Madge, but she did not thank him, because that didn't come natural. But she became friendlier at once, and they laughed together about the time he had let Pete out of her room on the ladder. This was a secret between the three. And Pete told him she had been forbidden to go to Linda May's party; and Madge told him Arthur had refused to take her, and how they had "quit speaking" which the girl spoke of as a sort of joke. Madge, thawing still more, asked him if he knew anything about discount. When he said he did, she opened her arithmetic and showed him an example she couldn't "get." So Edgar "got" it, while Pete went off to swing by herself. Then Linda May came by. She said she couldn't stop because Aunt Dollie was sending her to town for steak. "You wait," said Madge, "and I'll go ask mamma if I can go to town with you." "Me too," cried Pete, getting out of the swing in such a hurry that Edgar looked another way. "You come too," Linda May said to Edgar. The young man beamed; he had feared they were all going to desert him. "All right," he said, "and Pete shall show me how to buy some candy. By the way, since we pass my hotel, I'll bring out your dog, Linda May, and take him with us.

"Oh, yes!" cried Linda May, "and let me lead him, will you?" So they went down town, all five, counting the dog. Linda May led Lucifer and patted him a good deal. Lucifer liked it. They had not gone far when Pete made a sudden dive as if a mosquito had nabbed her; but it was only her garter slipping. That seemed to remind Linda May, and she fetched up hers. Then Madge put hers to rights; she was more expert, and could 'tend to it without stopping, though obliged to adopt a hobbling gait. Edgar felt that it was his turn next, but he said nothing. They reached town. "Must we go first for the meat or candy?" said Madge with interest. "Meat," said Linda May. "Aunt Dollie first. I'm afraid she wouldn't like it if she knew I was with Lucifer. Smell my hand, Pete; think sheekin find out?" Pete took Linda May's hand and inhaled it. "It smells doggy," she said, "but you can stop and wash at our house on your way home." "No, I can't, she told me not to stop on the way." "Well, I'll run ahead," said Pete, "and bring out a pan of water and walk beside you, and you can wash without stopping." "Yes," said Linda May brightly. "Won't that look funny?" asked Madge doubtfully. Linda May said, as if thinking aloud, "Ain't they lots of ways?" Nobody asked what she meant. "Mr. Brown," said Linda May, "do you think it very wrong for me to have Lucifer awhile to play with, and then not tell Aunt Dollie?" "I'd rather buy the candy than decide that point," said Edgar; "come on."

Stranger Than Fiction

A Remedy Which Has Revolutionized the Treatment of Stomach Troubles.

The remedy is not heralded as a wonderful discovery nor yet a secret patent medicine, neither is it claimed to cure anything except dyspepsia, indigestion and stomach troubles with which nine out of ten suffer.

The remedy is in the form of pleasant tasting tablets or lozenges, containing vegetable and fruit essences, pure aseptic pepsin (government test), golden seal and diastase. The tablets are sold by druggists under the name of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. Many interesting experiments to test the digestive power of Stuart's Tablets show that one grain of the active principle contained in them is sufficient to thoroughly digest 3,000 grains of raw meat, eggs and other wholesome food.

Stuart's Tablets do not act upon the bowels like after dinner pills and cheap cathartics, which simply irritate and inflame the intestines without having any effect whatever in digesting food or curing indigestion.

If the stomach can be rested and assisted in the work of digestion it will very soon recover its normal vigor, as no organ is so much abused and overworked as the stomach.

This is the secret, if there is any secret, of the remarkable success of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, a remedy practically unknown a few years ago and now the most widely known of any treatment for stomach weakness.

This success has been secured entirely upon its merits as a digestive pure and simple because there can be no stomach trouble if the food is promptly digested.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets act entirely on the food eaten, digesting it completely, so that it can be assimilated into blood, nerve and tissue. They cure dyspepsia, water brash, sour stomach, gas and bloating after meals, because they furnish the digestive power which weak stomachs lack and unless that lack is supplied it is useless to attempt to cure by the use of "tonics," "pills" and cathartics which have absolutely no digestive power.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets can be found at all drugstores and the regular use of one or two of them after meals will demonstrate their merit better than any other argument.

The Resurrection of Jesus.*

The bruised and broken body of Jesus rested in the tomb. Well had it earned the respite of that quiet Sabbath. Placed hurriedly in the sepulcher in the late afternoon of Friday, it had not received that careful embalming which the hands of love would fain have given it. The group of holy women who had followed Jesus from Galilee had prepared a quantity of spices and ointments, and waited only till the Sabbath was past to visit the grave of their Lord, and perform this last office of affection. They did not know that the Jews had secured a watch over the place, and that the tomb itself had been marked with the seal which it was a capital crime to break. When the morning began to break in the east, these women hastened to the garden where they had seen the Savior buried by Joseph and Nicodemus. It was an embassy of love, and it met with love's reward. For, instead of the corpse over which they had come to weep, they found the Lord of life, who filled their lips with laughter and their hearts with praise.

Other lives have ended at the grave. Biographers turn away from the tomb of their heroes, and close the volume of their life-story. But the biographers of Jesus found in death only an episode of his life—the supreme episode, it may be, but not its closing one. What was defeat to other of earth's mighty, was an occasion for the manifestation of his power and glory. The death of Jesus was not the setting of heaven's Sun. It was a momentary eclipse, from which the Light of the World emerged into unfading and unspeakable glory, to lighten forever the pathway of the human race. No wonder the Church has ever since kept the Lord's day, instead of the ancient Sabbath. The latter saw the hope of Israel laid away beneath the ground, the powers of evil seemingly triumphant, and the friends of truth and righteousness abandoned to a blank despair. The former brought to them a newborn hope, brighter because of the utter darkness out of which it arose, and strong with the strength of personal and oft-repeated assurance. "Now is Christ risen from the dead" became the watchword of the band of believers, whose faith was to conquer the world's unbelief, and enthrone their Lord in the hearts of millions yet unborn.

The little company of women made their way through the dim light of the dawn, saying as they approached the place, "Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the tomb?" Blessed faith, which stopped not at the thought of difficulties, but calmly pressed on in its mission of love, feeling that, somehow, there would come help when their own strength should prove insufficient. Why do we not always consent to walk by faith, instead of ever demanding to see the way before us? Their simple trust was justified. They found the stone rolled away. Matthew tells us how it was done. Heaven had watched with wonder the awful tragedy of Calvary, and with dismay, perchance, beheld the Lord of life expire upon the cross. What were the thoughts of the angel hosts during that Sabbath of the world's darkest night, we may not know. But we can imagine with what joy the messengers from the skies received the command to descend and roll away the stone from the sepulcher of the Christ. They might well have sung a glad song, as did those on Bethlehem's hills, that first Christmas morning, when the Prince of Peace was born. The earth trembled at their presence, and their glory struck dismay to the hearts of the watching soldiers. The occupant of the grave arose, and, laying aside the cerements of the tomb, came forth to breathe again the air of heaven.

The awestruck women slowly approached the open tomb, and, after a brief pause, entered the gloomy cavern. It was empty, except for the cloths which had bound the body of Jesus. Suddenly a light shone about them, and they were conscious of the presence of two resplendent forms, whose very garments seemed woven of the sun's bright rays. Falling to the earth, they hear the words of the angels, words whose full meaning they could not at once comprehend. "Why seek ye the living among the dead? He is not here, but is risen, as he told you before." Dimly, like a dying echo, there recurred to them the saying of their Master, which he had spoken while yet in Galilee, that he would be crucified, and would rise from the dead the third day. They seemed dazed, and unable to form a clear idea of what had happened. But as they went in haste to tell the disciples what they had seen and heard, their bewilderment cleared away, and their testimony of the angels' message was distinct and positive. And so the first to tell men of the risen Christ were women, and these humble evangelists were the forerunners of a mighty host of consecrated handmaidens of the cross, who have loved to tell the sweet story of him who gave to woman her heritage of liberty and love.

Men are even yet wont to treat the ideas of women with scant respect, and it is not strange that the company of Jesus' followers made light of the report brought by these humble Marys and their companions. Two of the disciples, however, Peter and John, were so wrought up by the report that they ran to see what truth there might be in it. John tells us that he reached the tomb first, but that he did not enter until Peter, the impetuous disciple, pushed by him and went into the tomb. Then he followed, emboldened, as the timid ever are by the example of the bolder. They found the linen cloths that had been wrapped about the body of Jesus neatly folded and laid aside. The Victor over death had not been hurried in his casting off of the self-assumed bondage. Like one who rises from the peaceful sleep of the night at break of day, he had risen from the grave and left his lowly bed in perfect order. The beloved disciple tells us that, when he saw this, he believed, and he was probably the first of the twelve to realize the fact of the resurrection. Upon him rested the blessing of those "who see not, yet believe." With joy and wonder, mixed in strange proportion, the two disciples returned to their temporary home in the city, unconscious of the mighty events yet to transpire before the close of that first Lord's day, by which the strange hope that had begun to arise in their hearts should reveal itself as the day-spring from on high, of which the prophets had spoken, and for which the race had ever yearned in unspeakable desire. The world could never again be the same to them, for life had triumphed over death.

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

TOPIC FOR APRIL 7.

Dead to Sin: Alive to Christ.

(Eph. 2:1-10.)

Paul uses a great deal and very effectively this figure of two persons in one. I die and yet I live. I struggle with myself. I may be alive to evil, or I may be alive to good. At one time the better part of me may live and the worser be dead; at another time the reverse may be true.

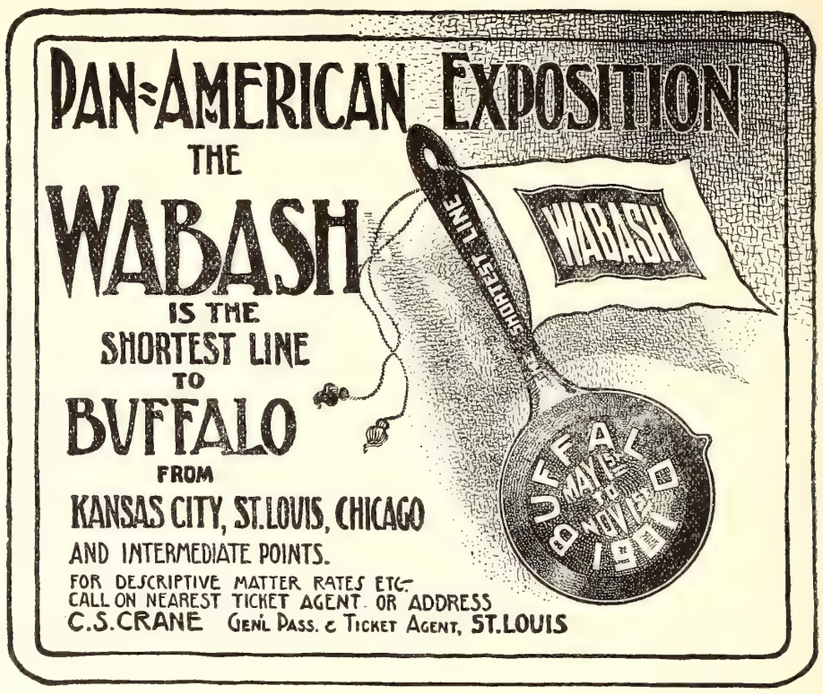
Are there not plenty of people who are dead while they are alive? Watch the people who sit opposite to you in a street car, or in a railway train, or the people who walk past your store, or those who gather at the market square, or about the school-house or church door, and tell us how many of them are truly alive and how many dead. Are there not people whose faces show the death of the soul within them? Stephen Phillips, the poet, is not the only man in the world who has seen "the woman with the Dead Soul."

And then what a resurrection it is when one of these who are dead to all the highest and best things in the world, awakens to his truer and better self and begins to live! The freedom of the slaves? That was nothing in comparison with the freedom that comes to those for whom some angel has rolled away the stone off their sepulchre and given them life. As Jesus gave Lazarus life, so has he given many another life. He came that we might have abundant life. His preaching of the kingdom was the preaching of LIFE. It was his great message. And have we not seen men and women, you and I, who have been dead to all that is highest and best who have come to life again at the command of our great Lord?

And how about us ourselves? Are we dead or alive? And which way are we dead and which way alive? Are we alive to sin? Is there any live sin in us? How much alive is it? Are we throttling it? Have we got it by the throat?

Or, to reverse the situation, is there true life in us? How much? Are the thorns choking that little life out? Has the evil got us by the throat and is it trying hard to throttle us?

If we are alive to sin, we'll bring forth the fruits of sin—anger, malice, intemperance, evil communications and the whole brood. If we are dead to sin and alive to Christ, we'll bring forth the fruits of the spirit, the whole progeny of heaven; love, joy, peace, long suffering, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, temperance.



Of course Paul shows us that we are not completely dead either way, nor altogether alive either way. No one ever altogether attains. The struggle against the crop of thorns and thistles goes on perennially on a farm and in a life. The very last moment of our lives will not see us freed from the age-long strife. Even to our death-beds we must struggle for the life in Christ and combat the life in evil. Let us not be discouraged if evil keeps popping up and trying to scare us. As Carlyle says somewhere: "Hell is paved with good resolutions broken. Up, ye sluggards and break the devil's head with them!"

Blessed is he that overcometh! To the victors shall certainly belong the spoils of Satan. He that wins in this terrible strife with evil, and gradually slays the sin in him, shall inherit the brighter crown in proportion to the size of his struggle and the completeness of his triumph.

FREEMAN.

Rebekah E. Freeman was born Sept. 12, 1839. Early in life she obeyed the gospel, became a member of Christ's Church, in which she lived a Christian until her death, Mar. 9. Having passed the 62d mark on life's journey, and while the rapidly lengthening shadows were falling eastward, she passed from our number but not from our memories. She will be remembered as a true wife, a lenient mother and a consistent Christian. Sister Freeman leaves a husband and five children to mourn her death. May God cheer them. Funeral services were conducted by T. H. Goodnight, pastor of Meridian Church.

HUMPHREY.

The entire city of St. Louis was shocked on Wednesday, March 20, when it became known that Charles Humphrey was dead. Shortly after eight o'clock that morning, he was found in his musical studio, on Olive street, lying in front of his piano. Near him lay a revolver with two empty chambers. The wounds were of such a nature that it is certain that death was practically instantaneous.

Charles Humphrey was widely known as a singer. He ranked as one of the foremost tenors in the United States. For almost fifteen years his home had been in St. Louis, but he had sung in many places in all parts of the country, and the news of his death will bring a shade of sadness to thousands of persons who had been charmed by his wonderful voice.

It was in 1886 that Morgan Morgans, the evangelist, held a meeting in West Plains, Mo. Among the number who then confessed Christ and were baptized was Charles Humphrey, a young man of 20 years. Mr. Morgans heard him sing, and immediately engaged him to travel with him and assist him in evangelistic work. After a few months thus spent, they went together to the general convention at Kansas City, in October, 1886. There the young singer was heard, and all were delighted with his wonderful rendering of simple gospel hymns. A month later he came to St. Louis to study music. He was at once engaged by the Central Christian Church, and for seven years sang for this congregation, of which he was a member. He afterward became connected with the choir of the Second Baptist Church, and there remained until his death.

No one who knew Charles Humphrey believes for a moment that he was responsible for his death, or that any guilt attaches to him for the act. The finger that pressed the trigger of the revolver was not guided by a mind accountable for its impulses. For months he had been in poor health and despondent. For some time before his death his actions had been somewhat peculiar, though not so disordered as to cause any acute apprehension on the part of his family. He suffered from insomnia, and had had very little sleep for several nights. The conclusion is that that last night of sleeplessness and depression was too much for his nervous system, already weakened, to stand. He arose early, left his home for his studio, wrote a brief note of farewell to his mother, and fired the fatal shot.

I knew him well. By nature he was cheerful, kind-hearted, reverent, courteous. Musically, he was an artist, of a degree of excellence that is all too rare. He was the support and stay of a widowed mother and of a sister, to whom he was ever most tender and affectionate. That he was widely beloved was shown by the expressions of grief from thousands, and by the declaration of the Globe-Democrat: "No death in recent years has cast such a gloom over the city, or been so universally regretted."

Funeral services were held in St. Louis, March 21, conducted by Rev. F. O. Fannon, of the First Christian Curch, and Rev. W. W. Boyd, of the Second Baptist Church, and at Hematite, Mo., where the burial was, on March 22, conducted by Rev. F. O. Fannon. The body was followed to the grave by a large company of sorrowing friends.

ARTHUR O. GARRISON.

LEAVELL.

Maggie Dona Leavell, wife of G. C. Leavell, was born in Mercer county, Ohio, April 13, 1870. Was married Jan. 2, 1890, died Feb. 24, 1901, at Morehouse, Mo., age 30 years, 10 months, 23 days. She united with the Christian Church in 1893 under the preaching of J. O. Henry and lived a consistent Christian life until death. She leaves a husband and two little boys, mother and one brother.

LONGDON.

The Church of Christ of this place has lost one of its most valuable and efficient members in the death of Sister Longdon, wife of the minister. She was called home to the Father and to her child which went before her several years ago, Sunday, March 10, at 12:30 o'clock. Bro. and Sister Longdon came here in 1891. Sister Longdon was an earnest and faithful Christian worker. She always supported her husband in the work of the Lord. In 1894 the church met with reverses which compelled them to discontinue the support of a regular minister, but with her income she was able to provide for the family, and thus the work of the Lord went on without any hindrance. As a wife and mother she was amiable, affectionate and kind-hearted, and was beloved and respected by all. Birdella M. Longdon was 31 years of age, and leaves a husband and son to mourn her death. Her body was taken to Pittsburg, Pa., her native home, for interment. Several days before her death she told some of her friends that she was not afraid to die. While the hearts of her intimate friends are wounded for the present, they are comforted that she is with him who is ever good.

MARTIN.

Robert Ellsworth Martin, son of David and Nancy Martin, was born at Morristown, W. Va., Aug. 15, 1888, died of typhoid fever Mar. 16, 1901, aged 12 years, 7 months and 1 day. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. Geo. C. Ritchie, of Keota. Four little boys of his Sunday-school class were his pallbearers. He was a good, loving, trusty and obedient boy. The last book he ever read was "In His Steps." He was a sweet singer. The last song he ever sang was, "Row Us Over the Tide." Every one that knew him loved him.

ROBERTSON.

Mrs. T. L. Robertson, after a very brief illness, passed to her eternal reward Feb. 19, 1901. She died at her home in Ozark, Mo. It was an unspeakably sad death. She was only 38 years of age. A beautiful home had just been completed. After years of toil and economy she and her faithful husband were in a position to enjoy the fruit of their labors. The home was blessed with three girls who need a mother's care. Almost without warning she was snatched away. But thanks be to God she had, early in life, given her heart to the Savior, in whom she trusted to the end. This is our comfort. Her body, with that of Mother Robertson, was lowered at the same time into its last resting place at Ozark on Feb. 21. May the good Father bless and keep the broken hearted husband and motherless children. The service was the same with that of Mother Robertson.

ROBERTSON.

Mrs. Martha J. Robertson departed this life, after a brief illness, on Feb. 20, 1901, at her home in Ozark, Mo. She was in her 66th year of age, and for some time past had been in unusually good health. Her maiden name was Payne and her parents were among the very first settlers of Green Co. Her father, Larkin Payne, was president of the first bank organized in Springfield. Mother Robertson early became a disciple of Christ. To this profession she was faithful until death. She was a charter member of the congregation at Ozark, and one of its most faithful members. She was a positive character and held strong convictions. She was a great Bible reader and lived in the spirit of prayer. She was liberal with her means both to the church and the poor. Seven children survive her, all Christians but two. The wife of the writer is one of them. Services were held at the home of her oldest son, T. L. Robertson, at Ozark, by Bro. T. A. Foster, of Sparta, Mo.

POPULAR HYMNS No. 2

By C. C. CLINE

The ruling purpose of the author has been to give to the public a worthy successor of Popular Hymns. He has not sought to duplicate it, but to make a book as well adapted to the new methods of Church, Sunday-school and C. E. work as the first was to the conditions twenty years ago when Popular Hymns was launched upon its long and useful career. POPULAR HYMNS NO 2 is better than its predecessor, not because it contains better music, but because the music is better adapted to the present wants of all the working forces of the army of the Lord.

Evangelists will find the Gospel Proclamation in Song a department of the book eminently suited to every phase of a successfully conducted revival.

Choristers will find the average choir supplied with a rich selection of beautiful and impressive solos with choruses, duets, quartettes, invocations and doxologies specially selected for the distinctive part a choir is expected to take in the service.

Pastors who are responsible for the kind of pasture upon which the sheep and lambs are fed will NOT find a sentiment out of harmony with New Testament Christianity. He will find it a companion vade mecum for his pocket Testament, containing gems for public worship, for the prayer-meeting, for funeral occasions, for Baptismal, Thanksgiving and Convention services. He will find that an expensive hymnal will not be needed unless it be to keep in the style.

Christian Endeavorers will find in Popular Hymns No. 2 all that they can wish, because it is full from back to back with soul-stirring sentiment set to soul-inspiring music, the only kind C. E's care to sing. The Solos, Duets, and Quartettes may be impressively used to enrich every session of the Society.

S. S. Superintendents who believe the Sunday-school should be the nursery of the church, the church at work saving the young, will find Popular Hymns No. 2 richly supplied with music within the voice compass and heart reach of the children, giving them a desire to remain and participate in the song service of the church. Like edecessor,

"A Daniel Come to Judgment."

It is even so at last and it happened in the town of Winchester, Indiana, yesterday. The suit was brought by certain "Antis" of the town of Lynn in the county of Randolph in the name of Daniel Sommer's "Church of Christ" and was for the purpose of ousting from the church property. In one form or another the case has been dragging along for about two years. It was disposed of yesterday without the defense putting a witness on the stand. Daniel Sommer was the expert or "star" witness for the prosecution and among other things testified that Thomas Campbell was a Baptist when he wrote "The Declaration and Address," the date of which he did not know. He testified moreover that Alexander Campbell was a Baptist all the time he was editing The Christian Baptist. In the course of his testimony he instanced a number of places where Alexander Campbell had "diverged" from the true faith of the "Church of Christ." The defense gave him plenty of rope and the usual result followed. The attorneys, Messrs. Nichols and Carter, and Engle, Caldwell and Parry, took him along over the "Names of the Church," and over the question of "Societies" and over the question of "Expediency" through literature which he was as ignorant of as he would be of one of the occult sciences of the Greeks. He is the most poorly posted "specialist" that I ever heard testify. He realized the difference between testifying before the sisters at Sand Creek and testifying before the court in Winchester, but his knowledge came too late to help him. He quit at noon and did not return. His lawyer—Coppage, of Crawfordsville—did come back after dinner and requested that the case be dismissed. The defense had not called a witness. Bro. L. L. Carpenter and Brethren Land and Hammond were there to testify for the churches in Indiana and I had been called to speak for Kentucky, but we were not needed and were not called to the stand. D. Sommer got him out of town speedily, leaving the "Antis" of Lynn with the bag to hold. The church at "Beanville" will now go into mourning for ninety days. The whole church owes a debt of gratitude to the legal firms which I have named. I have seen and heard and read a good deal on this miserable question since the issuance of the "Sand Creek" manifests and from what the above named legal gentlemen did in this case, and the ease and speed with which they did it, I am satisfied that the final overthrow of this piece of opinionism is in sight.

"For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised: and if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished. If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable. But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the firstfruits of them that slept. For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order: Christ the firstfruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming. Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. . . . . For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,

For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

Current Events.

Aguinaldo Captured. The story of the capture of Aguinaldo by Gen. Funston and a little band of ex-insurgent Filipinos is already too well known to require further statement. The plan by which five American officers, pretending to be the prisoners of their Filipino allies, were taken into the presence of the dictator in northeastern Luzon, captured him and his two principal staff-officials in the midst of his body-guard, and carried them to the coast to meet the gun-boat which was waiting there, would fit more naturally into one of our highly colored historical romances, in which probability is never of any consequence, than into a sober narrative of modern warfare. The fatigue, the hunger and the exposure which it involved, the possibility of treachery on the part of the allies, the chance of being beaten in the fight with the body-guard, the chance of meeting other and larger bodies of insurgents in that remote corner of the island, were dangers which had to be weighed and risks which had to be taken. The success of the plan in spite of all these difficulties exhibits a degree of personal courage and of ability in that irregular form of warfare which one is not likely soon to see surpassed. Gen. Funston's reward came promptly in his appointment as brigadier-general in the regular army. This was done upon Gen. MacArthur's recommendation in spite of the protests of most of the regular army men, who naturally do not approve of giving high offices to men who have not the technical West Point training. The general public, however, is well satisfied with the promotion. What Funston may lack in science he makes up in nerve and dash, and those are qualities which are not out of place even in a brigadier-general.

Anti-cigarette Laws. During the sessions of those legislatures which have met during the past winter, there has been an immense amount of agitation directed against the deadly cigarette. It is stated on good authority that only two states, Wyoming and Louisiana, have failed to give attention to this subject. All the others have debated the question and eleven have passed anti-cigarette laws. In many cases existing laws which had fallen into desuetude by reason of official laxity have been revived and enforced. The New Hampshire legislature adopted a measure making it a misdemeanor for any person, firm or corporation to make, sell or keep for sale any form of cigarette, under penalty of a fine of $10 for the first offense and $50 for any subsequent offense. This is a particularly stringent measure, since it makes no distinction between the sale of cigarettes to minors and adults. In most cases an effort is made merely to prevent their sale to minors. Many habitual smokers who are on principle opposed to prohibitory legislation have advocated such laws on the ground that the state has a right to protect minors from the consequences of their own folly, and not adults. For our own part, we believe that the state has a right to prohibit even adults from practices which are harmful to themselves. That much paternalism in our government will do us no harm. On this principle we base the opinion that the state has a right not only to prohibit the sale of alcoholic beverages to minors, but also to prohibit the manufacture and sale of them to anybody.

China Rejects Russia's Treaty. The Russo-Chinese treaty, which had been formulated at St. Petersburg, was presented to the Chinese minister at that place March 13, to be signed within two weeks. After successive modifications of the instrument, the time has expired and the treaty is unsigned. The Emperor of China has communicated to the Czar his opinion that the provisions of the treaty are not consistent with the maintenance of his sovereignty over Manchuria. China evidently counts on the support of the Powers in resisting Russia. Will she get it? Not unanimously. England is too busy, the United States will probably do nothing more than protest, and Germany cannot be relied upon. Only Japan is ready for the fray. It is reported that she has already sent troops to Seoul and will prepare to make Korea the scene of war.

World's Fair Commissioners. After much speculation the names of the government commissioners for the Louisiana Purchase Exposition have been made public. They are Ex-Senators Thurston of Nebraska, Carter of Montana, Lindsay of Kentucky and McBride of Oregon, Ex-Representatives Allen of Mississippi and Glynn of New York, and Messrs. F. A. Betts of Connecticut, P. D. Scott of Arkansas and J. F. Miller of Indiana. The list has been made up carefully with a view to representing all sections. New England and the Pacific Coast each have one representative, the Central States are represented and the states included in the Louisiana Purchase have an adequate number of commissioners well distributed. It was not expected that any Missourian would be named, but it is possible that Joseph Flory may be made secretary of the commission. There are five Republicans and four Democrats in the body. The first call for the payment of World's Fair subscriptions has been made and 10 per cent. payments are now due. The amounts have been a little slow in coming in, owing probably to the excitement incident to the local political campaign. For the same reason, speculation in regard to the location of the Fair and movements aiming to pull it here or there have been in abeyance for the last few days.

The President's Tour. Much interest is being manifested in all parts of the country in President McKinley's prospective tour through the country. It will be a remarkable journey in many respects. Starting from Washington about April 19, the special train which will convey the President and his official family will go to New Orleans, and thence on to the Pacific coast, passing up through California to Oregon and Washington, and will return eastward through the northern tier of states. The tour will virtually end at Buffalo early in June, where the presidential party will visit the Pan-American Exposition. The journey will cover in all about 14,000 miles, and stops will be made at many points. Regions will be visited which have never before seen a president. An extraordinary feature of the trip is that President McKinley will be accompanied by his entire Cabinet, with the possible exception of Mr. Gage, and each of these heads of departments will have his corps of clerks and secretaries, so that the special train will carry the entire executive branch of the government in full operation. Never before has the government been mobilized to such an extent as this. Constant telegraphic communication with Washington will be maintained, and the President, who will at that time probably be somewhere on the Pacific coast, will press the electric button which will start the machinery at the opening of the Pan-American Exposition at Buffalo, May 1.

The Election in St. Louis. The municipal election in St. Louis was held Tuesday, April 2. Some of the peculiar and interesting phases of this contest which have made it a matter of interest all over the country, have already been noted. In any case St. Louis will have for mayor a good, clean citizen, but it will also have, except in the improbable event of Mr. Meriwether's election, a corrupt ring, clamoring for spoils. The intelligent citizens of St. Louis are choosing between Mr. Wells and Mr. Parker according as they believe that one or the other will be most able to resist his camp-followers. Several weeks ago the Evangelical Alliance appointed a committee of fifty well-known and public-spirited men to investigate the candidates of all parties and report upon their fitness for office. The investigation had to do solely with the character of the nominees, their reputation for honesty and ability. In the case of two important offices no nominee was found worthy of recommendation and only thirteen out of fifty-six nominees for the House of Delegates (on the Republican and Democratic tickets) were found worthy. It is to be regretted that the report of this committee was not more specific in uncovering the records of the men who are candidates for office and that it has not received greater publicity. It is hard to believe that it is a mere matter of chance that one of the parties has twelve Roman Catholics on its city ticket and twenty-six (out of a total of twenty-eight) on its list of nominees for the House of Delegates. As one Irishman was overheard saying to another recently, "On the whole, Pat, the church never nominated a better ticket."

Election Frauds. The grand jury of the Circuit Court for the February term has just finished its work, a part of which consisted in finding indictments against thirty-two persons in St. Louis for election frauds. Most of these persons were judges or clerks of election. We have already expressed with sufficient clearness our opinion of the election law under which these frauds were perpetrated and of the legislature which passed that law. The Nesbit Law has been amended. How effective the amendments will be St. Louis is finding out to-day. In the grand jury's report occur these words:

"We are appalled, as our predecessors no doubt were, at the unmistakable evidence of the most flagrant, defiant and audacious violations of the sanctity of the ballot-box that were committed at the election on November 6 last. It was in evidence before us that fraudulent registration was carried on to a very great degree. We believe that many thousand fictitious names were put upon the registration books and a very large number of these fictitious names were voted. While it is practically impossible to get the names and find indictments against all the persons guilty of perpetrating these frauds, we cannot but feel that great carelessness, if nothing more, was practiced by the authorities in permitting these serious violations of the law. From the evidence presented to us, we believe there is a well organized band of men, mostly those known as police characters with many aliases, without home or permanent place of abode, who systematically vote on fictitious names that are on the registration list. These men, we believe, are led and directed by trusted lieutenants of certain prominent politicians who are more culpable than the real perpetrators of these crimes against the sanctity of the ballot. We endeavored to obtain the evidence that would justify indictments against these arch conspirators, but were unable to get enough of such evidence as is required by the courts to convict. We cannot conceive of a more serious state of affairs than that which existed in this city at the time of the election in November, and which, we believe, still exists to a very great extent."

That is the situation as it is in St. Louis to-day, estimated not from a one-sided political standpoint, but by a grand jury. This is our paramount issue.

Is a Christian Theatre Possible? This question is raised by Rev. Charles M. Sheldon in a recent article in the Independent. Mr. Sheldon admits that he knows nothing about the theatre from observation, but his estimate of it is not likely to be seriously questioned by any thoughtful person. The influence of the plays which are presented nowadays to the American public is sometimes morally elevating, more often without moral quality either good or bad, but harmful in a negative way because worthless and frivolous, and often positively dangerous and prejudicial to good morals. Any dramatic critic will admit that the second and third classes, the worthless and the dangerous, are large. But whatever may be said of the first class of plays, the morally uplifting, it is obvious that we do not as yet have any Christian plays. An occasional dramatized novel, like "Quo Vadis" and "Ben Hur," does not disprove this statement. The question which Mr. Sheldon raises is whether or not it is possible to surround the drama with such influences that it shall be a positive and Christian force for righteousness. The dramatic instinct is as primitive and ineffaceable as the story-telling impluse. The modern theatre had its birth in the representation of religious events in the court-yards of churches. Can it again be made a religious institution? The novel has already been partially reclaimed and here and there, in that wilderness of rubbish which calls itself popular fiction, appear—rari nantes in gurgite vasto—a few novels which are positive forces for the world's uplift and some that are in the strictest sense Christian. The question is, Will it be possible to do the same thing with the stage? We fight bad literature with good literature. Shall we fight bad plays with good plays, or with something different? It will be understood that we do not raise this question with a view to answering it. Mr. Sheldon does not answer it in the article referred to. This much can be said, that there is no inherent incompatibility between the church and the theatre, and the estrangement which exists between them at present is caused by the decadence of the latter. Many difficulties, perhaps insuperable difficulties, would stand in the way, not the least of which would be the conviction of many Christian people that the theatre is either not capable of being saved for higher uses or not worth saving. But it might be both possible and desirable to have a Christian theatre under Christian influences where Christian plays would be performed by Christian actors. We don't know whether it would be or not, but it might be perhaps.

Improved Forestry. The science and art of forestry, a department of the highest importance in our country, has never received from our government the intelligent consideration which the subject merits. There have been occasional spasmodic spurts of interest on the part of the public and zeal on the part of the officials which have not been without beneficial results; but on the whole there has been more reckless abuse of timbered public lands in the United States than in any country in Europe. A newly devised plan, which has been agreed upon by the Secretaries of Agriculture and the Interior, proposes a transfer of the control of the forests from the latter department to the former. At present the work of forestry is divided into three parts which are unable to co-operate efficiently. One of these is already under the control of the Department of Agriculture. It is proposed to unify the work and give this department control of all the technical work connected with the forest reservations. Washington officials who are interested in the subject consider this the most important step that has been taken in regard to forestry for many years.

Brevities. Lord Salisbury's health is failing fast, and his retirement from public life at any time would cause no surprise.

Rev. John Jasper, the famous defender of the proposition that "the sun do move," died recently at Richmond, Va., at the age of 89 years.

The military court of inquiry which investigated the hazing and death of Cadet Booz, of West Point, has officially declared that his death was not in any way the result of hazing.

Attorney-General Griggs has resigned his place in the Cabinet, to take effect at once. His successor will probably not be filled until the President's return from his western tour in June.

The senatorial deadlock in the Nebraska legislature has been broken by the election of two Republican senators, Gov. C. H. Dietrich and J. H. Millard. The lieutenant-governor will succeed to the gubernatorial chair.

The Supreme Court of Kentucky, to which the Powers case was carried on appeal, has reversed the decision of the lower court, which gave him a life-sentence for complicity in the murder of Goebel, and has ordered a new trial.

Senor Sanguilly, the most prominent member of the Cuban Constitutional Convention, who was in favor of the Platt resolution, has resigned because he considers that his opinion on this point no longer represents the people who elected him.

United States Minister Loomis has returned from Venezuela and, though his departure is spoken of as a leave of absence rather than a recall, it is believed to be an expression of our government's disapproval of the present administration in Venezuela.

Harper's Weekly accuses the Executive of being completely controlled by the Senate. But where the Executive happens to be exactly at cross purposes with the Senate, as in the case of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty amendments, the administration is accused of truckling to Great Britain. It is hard luck for a President when he has to be opposed to everybody to preserve a reputation for independence.

Municipal elections were held on Monday of this week in many Ohio cities. The returns show Democratic gains in the larger places. Hon. Tom L. Johnson was elected mayor of Cleveland and was the only Democrat elected on the city ticket. Columbus, which has at present a Republican mayor, elected a Democrat by a plurality of 200. "Golden Rule" Jones, who made an independent campaign and had no committee to work for him, was elected to succeed himself as mayor of Toledo.

A disagreement between Pope Leo and the French government has led to a postponement of the consistory, at which new cardinals are to be named, until April 15. By a standing agreement, the French government has the right to nominate the French cardinals, but the Pope refuses to confirm those who have been chosen. The legislation against religious orders in France is at the bottom of the trouble. It is expected that nine new Italian cardinals will be chosen, but no foreigners. The choice of cardinals becomes an increasingly important matter as the Pope grows older and more feeble, for the cardinals will elect the next Pope.

Easter.

The glad tidings which the apostles were commissioned to preach to the whole world has for its culminating fact the resurrection of Christ. Next Lord's day is the anniversary of that sublime event. Let all Christendom rejoice and be glad. A risen Christ means a living Christ; a reigning Christ; a conquering Christ; an immanent Christ. But that means a living church; a united church; a triumphant church; a glorious church, "without spot or wrinkle." It means the reality and nearness of the spiritual world; the life beyond and glorified humanity.

Christ's resurrection transfigures life, gives dignity and meaning to our earthly struggles and sacrifices for the right, and opens up a glorious vision of unending progress and of immortal life. It furnishes motive vast enough for the most stupendous plans, the highest consecration of human wisdom and energy, and the most intense activity on the part of those who accept Christ's leadership in order that God's will shall be done on earth even as it is in heaven.

"Wherefore, my beloved brethren, be ye stedfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord."

The Use of a Church Congress.

Each session of the Congress of the Disciples of Christ furnishes additional proof of the wisdom of such a meeting and the good results flowing therefrom. As a unifier of sentiment and of feeling, as a remover of prejudice, as a means of clarifying the religious atmosphere, and of stimulating thought, there is nothing equal to it. These are great and important ends to be secured. In the absence of such free and untrammeled discussion as is there indulged in, on the great questions of our time, there are bound to be misapprehensions, unjust suspicions, and a growing chasm of difference. But meeting face to face, each uttering his deepest convictions, and comparing his views with those of others who differ from him, it becomes apparent, not that there are no differences, but that these differences are not half so vital as was supposed, and that such differences as do exist arise from no indifference to the truth, no conscious disloyalty to Christ, but chiefly from the difference in points of view. This begets charity and promotes unity and mutual respect.

In our first Congress the piece de resistance was Theology, its place and importance; in the second, it was higher criticism, its nature and results; in the third it was evolution, in relation to Christian thought and faith. In each of these Congresses there were, of course, other topics discussed, but those mentioned may be said to be the prominent themes. On all these questions there were supposed to be grave differences of opinion. But each Congress has minimized these differences and magnified the great truths about which there is substantial agreement. There is nothing like facing a ghost to down it. Panic arises from unknown or imaginary dangers. We are apt to be less dogmatic in expressing our own opinions when we are compelled to put them alongside of the opinions of others equally honest and equally intelligent.

In the Lexington Congress the chief discussion centered about the theory of evolution. Some things were made very clear. In the first place it was evident that nobody in that Congress believed that evolution was a substitute for a personal Creator. John Fiske's conception of evolution, as "God's way of doing things," was the only one that found any favor in the Congress. It was also made clear that no one in that Congress held a view of evolution that interfered with his acceptance of the great facts of the miraculous birth and resurrection of Christ and the well-attested miracles of the Old and New Testaments. It was held by Prof. Mackenzie and others that the introduction of new causes in the material and spiritual realms, to carry forward God's creative and redemptive purposes, was not destructive of that continuity of purpose, of plan, and of existing causes, which is essential to the theory of evolution. In a word we believe it was seen by all who closely followed the discussion that a conception of evolution which makes God the Evo'ver, and which leaves room for the introduction of new causes as they are needed to carry out the divine purpose, is not incompatible with Christian faith.

The Psychology of Conversion had new light shed upon it, showing that even that important change does not lie outside the realm of law, and is not disconnected with causes which are subject to human investigation and control. The subject of Christian union was given a historical setting and some wholesome rules for its further promotion. Woman's work in education, in the church and in the club was set forth by able representatives of the sex. "The Communion of Saints," regardless of denominational lines, was made manifest by the presence and the addresses of three distinguished preachers from other religious bodies. There is probably no brighter mind in the Congregational body of believers, which embraces so many accomplished men, than Prof. Mackenzie, whose keenness of intellect is equaled if not surpassed by his gentleness, his fine courtesy and his Christian faith. His paper was a luminous treatment of a confessedly difficult theme. Dr. Josiah Strong, who, while a Congregationalist, belongs to us all in an important sense, is a master of facts and statistics, and his able addresses filled us with hope for our country while they made us face its perils. Prof. Henderson, who spoke on the last night and whose address on foreign missions lifted us up to the mountain top from which Christ issued his royal mandate for the world's evangelization, represents the great Baptist family whose work in the foreign field entitles them to the gratitude and respect of the rest of the Christian world. It was a fitting climax for a great Congress. The ease and naturalness with which the Congress passed from the study and discussion of such living issues as Evolution and Psychology, in their relation to Christian faith and religious experience and Christian union, to the great task laid on the Church, the evangelization of the nations, shows clearly that it is not mere "dreaming," as one earnest brother called it, to deal with these great problems so vitally related to the progress of the kingdom of God.

A Congress which serves these great purposes and promotes these worthy objects has vindicated its right to live, and it will live so long as it maintains its present spirit and is true to its great mission.

Congressional Notes.

The best story told during the Congress was by W. T. Moore. Illustrating the vagueness and indefiniteness of some of the speeches, he said a gentleman traveling in the South stopped one night at a hotel where he was disturbed by the continual barking and howling of dogs. Rising from his bed he came downstairs and inquired of the colored porter on watch, what was the matter with the dogs that made them keep up such incessant barking. "Why, you see, Massa," said Rastus, "dey smells something, but dey can't zackly locate it!" Needless to say this brought down the house, and to such an extent that the doctor was unable to finish his speech.

Next to this was the story of S. T. Willis, who on rising to review the paper of B. A. Jenkins, said that the late Dr. Deems, of New York City, was once visited by a colored minister who complained that evolution was destroying his church. "How is that?" inquired the doctor. "Why, it's this way," said the ebony divine: "The other night at prayer-meeting Deacon Jones he prayed, 'Lord, save us from dis here evolushun that's sweepin' over the country.' Pretty soon Deacon Brown he prayed, 'Lord, give us more of dis here evolushun we's hearin' so much about!' So doctah, you see between these deacons Ise beaten black and blue!" The doctor added, said the speaker, "that he supposed the Lord had made him black, and that his deacons had made him blue." This idea of evolution, breaking out in a colored prayer meeting, quite amused the audience, in spite of its improbability.

All the papers of the Congress were able, though there were, of course, degrees of excellence; but two or three of them were too long. When a writer cannot express his thought in a satisfactory manner in one hour of steady reading, he either knows too much for a congress or else he is lacking in the art of condensation. Surely one hour ought to be the extreme limit of time that an audience should be asked to follow one writer, at one sitting. A paper for a public assembly ought to be written about three times; once for its thought, then for its literary style, and finally for the cutting out of all redundant words, phrases, sentences and paragraphs. Perhaps the last two may be combined.

The Central Church was an ideal place for a Congress. Its splendid auditorium was filled at each session, and its acoustic properties are excellent. It was no trouble to hear anybody who knew how to talk. The large number of students who attended the Congress manifested the deepest interest in the discussions, and took no pains to conceal their preference for the conservative view of things. That was entirely natural, under the circumstances, and entirely unobjectionable, except in one or two instances where we feared Prof. Mackenzie might have felt that, as a stranger and our guest, he was receiving scant courtesy in the tumultuous cheering that greeted every criticism aimed at him, and the comparative silence with which his defense and explanations were received by the local contingent. We are sure, however, no discourtesy was intended. It was only the youthful enthusiasm of students expressing their admiration for their teachers, and sympathy with their views. No one can doubt the popularity of Professors McGarvey, Deweese, Loos, Fairhurst and Grubbs with their pupils and the community in which they have so long lived. This was beautiful, and we are sure they are all worthy of it.

It was an intensely interesting moment of the Congress, when, after the able and luminous paper of Prof. Mackenzie, and a brief but strong and clear address by J. J. Haley, in substantial accord therewith, there appeared on the platform, without previous announcement, a small man with deep-set, dark eyes, gray hair, and having the appearance of an invalid, to reply to this explanation and defense of evolution. It was Prof. Grubbs. The deafening applause with which he was greeted must have excited the curiosity of the distinguished stranger. Warming to his subject at once, Prof. Grubbs demanded to know how evolution could be harmonized with the forgiveness of sins, "in the plural," not ours only, but those under the former dispensation? Could evolution wash the soul from sin? He quoted the New Testament freely to show the necessity for grace, for renewal, for pardon. All this he believed to be incompatible with evolution. His remarks implied, of course, that Prof. Mackenzie could not believe in these things and be an evolutionist. But the Scotch professor said in reply that he was as orthodox as any of the professors in any Bible College; that he believed in "the forgiveness of sins in the plural, based on the death of Christ in the singular." It was an instructive illustration of how two men, equally orthodox in the fundamentals of Christian faith, may occupy points of view so widely different.

Dr. Strong, in the introduction of his evening address, spoke of the pleasure he had in meeting with so earnest and aggressive a body of believers as the Disciples of Christ, and added: "We have heard a good deal in the past few years about pan-Presbyterian, pan-Methodist and pan-Baptist councils, but for my part, I shall be glad when we can find a pan large enough to hold us all!" When the applause had somewhat subsided, he added: "And this, when found, will no doubt be a pan-Christian council. When that time comes, you folks will feel at home with your name." This remark did not displease the Congress, as the reader may imagine, for in preferring and using scriptural names, we have been actuated by the motive of removing all reasonable objections to union by occupying an irenic position and wearing the common family names.

The singing during the Congress was a very enjoyable feature. This was specially true of the evening sessions, when the music was led by Dr. S. A. Donaldson and the splendid chorus choir of the Central Church. There were also anthems, solos, and some popular songs by a male quartette. The rendering of "My Old Kentucky Home" by the latter, on the last evening, was very fine and elicited hearty applause. The Congress, as a body, heartily joined in the hymns and made good music throughout the sessions. As to the hospitality nothing need be said, as we knew what to expect, and our expectations were even surpassed. At the hospitable home where the editors of this paper and their wives were entertained—Dr. Coyle's—it was a luxury to be sick, a positive delight to be hungry, and a four o'clock rising for an early train became an occasion of social enjoyment around an early breakfast! Everybody else seemed to be equally well treated. The meals served at the old Main Street Church, by the ladies, were 50 cent meals for which only 25 cents was charged. Brethren Mark Collis, I. J. Spencer, and others, devoted themselves to the welfare of the delegates.

On Thursday morning the Congress met with the students in Morrison Chapel of Kentucky University, and after an appropriate introductory talk by President Milligan and devotional exercises conducted by Pres. Kersey, of Bethany College, and F. D. Power, of Washington, a short address was made by A. B. Philputt which was much enjoyed by the students and others. The students sang "My Old Kentucky Home" while the audience was being seated. After these exercises were over the members of the Congress took their places on the broad steps leading up to Morrison Chapel, and in front of them, and were photographed by an enterprising local photographer. It was a fitting tribute to this old and tried institution, which seems to survive "The Reign of Law" and prosper, that this distinguished body of visitors should honor it by their presence in this old, historic chapel. The students exhibited a high degree of that indefinable and indispensable something called "college spirit," without which no college can live, and with which a college cannot die. Everyone who has tramped up and down the old Corridor at Bethany before chapel with a hundred singing students, knows what has kept Bethany alive during her years of financial depression. Kentucky University seems to have college spirit of the old Bethany type.

It was a very pleasant social function, very admirably carried out—that reception, with refreshments, given at Hamilton Female College by Principal Hagerman and his wife. A large number of the delegates attending the Congress availed themselves of the gracious invitation extended by Professor and Mrs. Hagerman to visit this institution and note its spacious rooms, so well suited for its work. To say that the young ladies were beautiful would probably be superfluous. They are mainly from the blue grass region. It was a characteristic and gracious thing to do to give this added social pleasure to the visitors from so many widely separated parts of the country. We were glad to see among the guests the father of the hostess, Alexander Campbell, of Bethany, W. Va., a son of the distinguished reformer.

Hour of Prayer.

The Christian Soldier.

TEXT. Suffer hardship with me, as a good soldier of Christ Jesus. No soldier on service entangleth himself in the affairs of this life; that he may please him who enrolled him as a soldier.—2 Tim. 2:3, 4.

The Christian life is a life of conflict. The Christian is a soldier, warring against the desires of the flesh. "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds." Nobody thinks of this as a carnal warfare, shedding blood like water and gashing the earth with graves; it is, nevertheless, a conflict, real, stubborn and relentless; it is no mimic fight.

The Christian's Armor.

Becoming a Christian is enlisting in a holy war, and one of the first requisites is the armor. Righteousness is the breastplate, truth the girdle, faith the shield and salvation the helmet. The weapon of offense is the sword of the Spirit, and there is no armor for the back (Eph. 6: 10-20). When we faint and fall in the midst of our enemies, when we are wounded and weakened and carried away captive by Satan at his will, it is because we have gone forth unarmed, trusting in our own prowess or wisdom to deliver us. "Wherefore take up the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to stand in the evil day."

Righteousness, truth and faith are defenses that cannot be pierced. Against them the shafts of malignity are flung in vain. "Thrice armed is he whose cause is just." These qualities are also energizing to the soul that possesses them. What resistless soldiers are they who have them!

"Their hearts are pure, their faith is strong,
Their hands are stout, their eyes are clear;
They hurl themselves against the wrong,
And hasten the millennial year."

The Fight of Faith.

Christians are not to engage in strange warfare. They are marshalled against a common foe. Is the warfare of rival sects a part of the fight of faith? Is not sectarianism itself something to be contended against? The Disciples of Christ think so; hence their plea for Christian union and the restoration of apostolic Christianity. We are to fight mammonism. "The love of money is a root of all kinds of evil." So when we strike at that baleful and sordid passion we strike at the tap-root of many evils. But we cannot enumerate all our foes; gluttony, intemperance, licentiousness, worldly pleasure, all excess, injustice in law and custom—individual sins and social and collective sins are to be fought down; we are to give no quarter.

In every campaign we are encouraged with the certain hope of victory. It is a fight of faith. "This is the victory that overcometh the world even our faith." The solid columns move forward with confidence; every blow is struck with the consciousness that it is helping to bring victory. If defeated, it is but for a moment. If we fight alone, and no comrade shares our burden, we are guided and guarded by the Captain of our salvation.

Whom to Please.

The enlisted soldier may be ambitious, but he strives to please his commander, not himself. So we are to please Him who enrolled us. We must be careful to know

His commands, and keep them; we must be sure that we are intent on executing the great commission he has entrusted us with. Christian soldiers must avoid entangling themselves with the affairs of this life. It is very easy to make what one of our great statesmen has called "entangling alliances." Do not bend your neck to be yoked with unbelievers. Do not permit the cares of this world to engross you. Again, we please our commander by taking our share of hardship, as good soldiers. Stand boldly, uncompromisingly for the right, in season and out of season; strike manful blows for the deliverance of your fellowmen, and you will suffer for your aggressiveness.

The Conqueror's Crown.

Weary soldier, do not fear that, having been loyal to the end, your merit will pass unrecognized and unrewarded. For you as for Paul and "all them that have loved his appearing," there waits the "crown of righteousness" (2 Tim. 4:5-8). General Jackson said to those who stood by his death-bed: "Let us cross over the river, and rest under the shade." The time will come for the last battle, the shout of final victory, and then, stripped of all warlike accoutrements, you will be crowned.

"He has finished his work, and his journey is over;
His warfare accomplished, his triumph begun;
He has laid down his armor beside the cold river,
And brilliant with stars is the crown he has won!"

Prayer.

O Thou God of battles, we thank Thee for a mighty Captain, and comradeship in a mighty host. We rejoice in the victories our fathers have fought and won; in the courage and the heroism that still mark the soldiers of the Cross; and in their loyalty to Jesus Christ our Lord. Wilt thou cheer the lonely, strengthen the weak, release the prisoner, and smite with confusion the enemy. Give victory to every struggling soul, and at last the victor's crown, through Him that loved us. Amen.

Editor's Easy Chair.

On our northward journey we tarried a day at Jacksonville, the gateway of entrance and exit for peninsular Florida. While writing our last Easy Chair notes there at "The Duvall," we were agreeably surprised by the entrance of J. T. Boone and O. A. Bartholomew. The latter was in Jacksonville to advise with the brethren in reference to their contemplated new church on the splendid lot they have recently secured. He was preaching for the church of evenings while there. We made an appointment with Bro. Boone and him to take a drive about the city and suburbs in the afternoon. In this drive we took in the "ostrich farm" near the city, and learned some of the peculiarities of this strange feather-producer, half bird and half beast in appearance. Judging from the number of people who visit this farm, and the amount of the admission fee, we should say this item alone was a considerable source of income. Jacksonville has some business houses highly creditable to its enterprise, and it abounds in stores where all manner of Florida souvenirs may be secured. In these the alligator and the negro are worked for all they are worth.

As the prosperity of Florida increases, so will that of Jacksonville. The travel to Florida has never been so large as during the past winter. We believe it is destined to increase, as the state furnishes a winter climate suitable for invalids or elderly people that is more accessible to the great body of people than any other. Whatever may be said of Mr. Flagler's railroad monopoly, it is certain that the Florida East Coast Railway Company has made the whole east coast, down as far as Miami, not only accessible but highly desirable as a resort by its improvements. The same may be said of the Seaboard and Plant systems of railroad, which penetrate the interior and west coast. These three railroad systems, with the St. John and Okla waha rivers and the coast steamers, open up this land of fruits, flowers and sunshine to the health-seekers and winter-dodgers of the colder regions of the north.

A half night and a half day at Savannah, Ga., did not give us much time to see the city. Wishing to make the most of the few hours we had we employed one of the registered hackmen to show us the sights. When we questioned him about the speed of his horse, before engaging him, he said he was "not a race horse." The cleverness of this reply, after we had had a little experience in trying to whip him into a slow trot, reminded us of David Harum's "hoss swap," in which his horse was said to stand as well without hitching as with it, and that a woman could drive him as well as a man! Our driver was truthful. His animal was "not a race horse"—not by a long ways! But we did get out to "Thunderbolt" and saw the oyster factories at work. We also found the monuments of General Nathanael Greene and of Sergeant Jasper, whose names and deeds connect the city with our revolutionary struggle. We could not learn, on inquiry from several citizens, whether Gen. Oglethorpe, the founder of the city and of the colony of Georgia, had a monument there or not. At least a street perpetuates his memory. It was a disappointment to us, on calling at the parsonage of the Christian Church, to find that Bro. Watkins had left the city for New York. We did not meet with any of the members. We saw the building, which did not seem to us very happily located for impressing people with the value and aggressive character of the plea it represents. But that is a fact we have often observed. If we have a good cause we ought to give it the best opportunity possible to win success. Often, of course, the city grows away from a church, and develops in a direction not contemplated. This may be the case in Savannah. But churches, like business houses, must adjust themselves to the city in which they operate.

A large part of the journey from Savannah to Columbia, S. C., lies through a low, swampy country, and we put in most of the time in looking over the songs in the newly-issued "Popular Hymns No. 2," edited by C. C. Cline and issued by Christian Pub. Co. While poring over, and singing, mentally, the sweet old songs in this popular collection, time passed so rapidly that we arrived at the capital of the "Palmetto State" before we knew it. A day in this city, under the guidance of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Walter, whose guests we were, gave us opportunity of visiting some of the great cotton factories here and of going through one of them, watching the various processes by which the rough cotton is transformed into the finished cloth. One can but feel a profound admiration for the genius of man which has invented and constructed all the machinery by which these processes are carried forward. And yet Arkwright was the object of popular animosity because of his inventions, and at one time a large factory of his was destroyed in the presence of the military and police who would not interfere. So the world has always treated its benefactors. A very large new factory is about ready to begin operations in Columbia, perhaps the largest in the South. All this means a new era of industrial activity for the South. We also visited the capitol building, containing a tablet bearing the original ordinance of secession, passed, we believe, Dec. 20, 1830, the anniversary of the landing of the Mayflower. But this is now ancient history.

Two days in "the land of the sky," at Asheville, N. C., was only sufficient to give us a glimpse of its mountain scenery. On Lord's day morning we found the new Christian Church, which is well located and is a very creditable building. Bernard P. Smith, whom we expected to find there, had closed his temporary engagement and had returned to his church at Charlottesville, Va. They had no preacher for that day, except the Elder, Bro. McCrary, who made a very good talk and presided at the Lord's table. We thought it prudent to remain incognito until the meeting was dismissed, and we greatly enjoyed the novel experience of worshiping in the pew, unrecognized, in a congregation of Disciples. We learned that Bro. Motley has been secured as pastor and was to begin his work there the following Lord's day. It is quite important to have a live, working church at this important point, and we are glad that so capable a man as Bro. Motley is to have charge of the work. Asheville is a thriving city, and is probably unexcelled in the beauty and grandeur of its scenery. The ranges of the Great Smoky Mountains and the Blue Ridge form a cordon of sky-piercing peaks around the city, on whose summits cloud and sunshine form pictures of marvelous beauty. The mountain scenery along the Southern Railway from the time it enters the state until it passes into Tennessee is bound to make it a popular route, for it is rarely excelled. This great railroad system has done and is doing much for the development of the New South.

We reached Lexington in good time to take in the third Congress of the Disciples of Christ, and probably the best one of the series, so far. Elsewhere we have sought to give our readers as good a report of it as our space and ability would permit. We never realize our unity of faith quite so much as when we attend one of these Congresses, and see how we can differ in opinion without interfering with our oneness in Christ. These lines are written in our office, where once more we have taken up such of the work as we feel able to bear. The vacation has been very profitable to us in every way, thanks to those who have borne extra burdens that we might rest, and to the kind friends whom we have met during our absence.

The Congress of The Disciples

A REPORT AND REVIEW

By W. E. Garrison

The Third Annual Congress of the Disciples of Christ convened in Lexington, Ky., Tuesday afternoon, March 26, under the ample hospitality of the Central Christian Church. The subjects for discussion were: The bearing of the evolutionary theory upon religious conceptions; the psychology of religious experience; and present-day phases of the Christian union problem. There was a great influx of visitors Tuesday morning, and at all of the sessions the intelligent people of Lexington filled such part of the spacious auditorium as was not occupied by the members of the Congress.

After introductory remarks by F. D. Power, general chairman of the Congress, the chair was occupied by I. J. Spencer, pastor of the church in which the Congress met, who introduced the first speaker, Prof. Alfred Fairhurst, of Kentucky University, whose subject was:

Is the Scientific Doctrine of Evolution Compatible with Christian Faith?

Prof. Fairhurst devoted by far the greater portion of his time to a consideration of the evolutionary theory as a scientific doctrine and to an argument to prove that it is not good science. This was interesting but not to the point. The question was not, Is the evolutionary theory true? but, Is it compatible with Christian faith? It might be a scientific error and yet harmless to faith. The speaker brought into prominence Spencer's statement of the data of evolution—"matter, motion and force." To say that these are the only elements of development is an unwarrantable hypothesis. There are facts, psychical and spiritual, which are not included in this classification. Therefore evolution is unscientific, as any theory must be which ignores facts. Since the evolutionary theory claims to explain the universe with only matter, motion and force as data, it sets up a determinism which rules out human freedom, it has no place for divine purpose, and it virtually rules out God. The assumed data necessarily lead to Haeckel's conclusion, destroying the freedom of the will, the immortality of the soul and the being of God. Science has no substitute for the statement that God created man in his own image and breathed into him the breath of life.

Criticism of Prof. Fairhurst's paper might begin with this last assertion. Science never has attempted to assert or deny the fact of creation and it does not profess to substitute anything for it. Darwin said that it was hopeless to try to explain the origin of life, much more the origin of substance. Science may try to show that the first creation of substance occurred not less than millions of years ago, but it cannot, as science, assert the eternity of matter and hence cannot rule out God as creator. If evolutionists assert that the development of this matter (the creation of which by God they cannot deny) has been continuous and in accordance with law, there is still room for God as the "resident force" by which his comes about. In other words, it is not fair to take the evolutionary formula, with its "matter, motion and force," define those terms as the anti-evolutionist defines them, and then conclude that evolution is a mechanical and God-less doctrine. Both Spencer and Huxley say that they would rather interpret matter in terms of mind, than mind in terms of matter. Their conceptions of matter and its activities must therefore have included elements which are ignored in any criticism which calls their theory materialistic. But the definition of matter and force is a question of philosophy, not of science. There may therefore be an atheistic evolutionary philosophy, but as science evolution cannot be atheistic.

Prof. Fairhurst asserted that the denial of all miracles is essential to the evolutionary theory. But Darwin, Wallace, La Conte, Drummond and Lyman Abbott do not deny the possibility or actuality of miracles. If they are not orthodox evolutionists, whom shall we name?

The discussion of this paper was opened by Jabez Hall, who said that we ought not to make it impossible for a man to be a Christian, no matter what scientific views he may hold, right or wrong. The assertion that evolution is incompatible with Christian faith is comparable to the similar statements which were once made about the Copernican astronomy and the law of gravitation. The scientific doctrine of evolution is almost universally accepted, and we risk too much when we say that it is inconsistent with belief in God and the Christian religion. Dr. Hall's speech was a magnificent burst of eloquence, not debating the truth or falsity of the scientific theory (which was not the question) but denying that any purely scientific doctrine can conflict with Christian faith.

After a rather desultory discussion, J. B. Briney made the appropriate suggestion that the question was not whether some men actually hold to both evolution and Christianity, but whether they are logically consistent in so doing. He thought not, because Genesis says Adam was created before Eve, whereas the evolutionary view of the origin of man would make the sexes arise simultaneously. This criticism shows only that evolution is incompatible with a certain method of interpreting Scripture—a method which is not inseparably connected with Christian faith.

Prof. W. D. Mackenzie cleared up the situation by emphasizing the distinction between evolution as a science and evolution as a philosophy. Science does not deal with causes, but with phenomena. It can only say that certain events occur in certain sequence; as science, it cannot say what force brings them about. Therefore no scientific doctrine can be incompatible with Christian faith, since they do not cover the same ground. On the basis of the scientific theory of evolution, philosopheis may be erected, agnostic like Herbert Spencer's or theistic like John Fiske's. Both are equally good evolutionists. The Christian philosopher has as good a right to use scientific evolution as has the agnostic philosopher.

In illustration of this point, Prof. S. M. Jefferson quoted La Conte's answer to the question, "Would you as a scientist deny the possibility of a miracle?" "No," said La Conte, "as a scientist I could not deny the possibility of a miracle; I should simply say I was not expecting one."

Others who participated in the general discussion were Albert Buxton, J. A. Lord, Robert Cave and Prof. Fairhurst (several times).

The Tuesday evening session, of which J. A. Lord was chairman, was devoted to upon which subject B. A. Jenkins presented a paper which, in addition to the value of its matter, was notable for the beauty of its literary style. The speaker began with some general considerations in regard to evolution. Fiske defines it as "God's way of doing things." If we use La Conte's definition, that "evolution is continuous and progressive change in accordance with law and as the result of resident forces," then the "resident forces" are, in the last analysis, God. He is force, but not only force. Evolution of religion is God's way of progressively revealing himself. It does not imply that religion is the product of material forces. Development does not mean that there are no eternal verities.

There are many definitions of religion. More definite than Schleiermacher's "sense of dependence" is Edward Caird's statement that "religion involves a conscious relation to a Being or Beings which we designate as divine." The development of consciousness, either in the individual or in the race, exhibits three stages: First, consciousness of the objective world, the Not-Self, and the naive interpretation of its phenomena as immediately divine. The earliest form of religion was probably the worship of the great forces of nature, based on a recognition of stones, winds, trees, rivers, etc., as friends or foes. The elevation of one god over all others leads first to Henotheism (the recognition of many gods but the worship of only one), and thence to Pantheism. To avoid the arid impersonality of Pantheism, the Greeks through their art personified the forces of nature in beautiful human forms, which helped to bridge the chasm from objective to subjective religion. Second, consciousness of the Self comes next and finds its religious significance in the attempt to find the laws of God in the human heart. Here religion begins to have an ethical content. But this too proves inadequate and ends either in Buddhistic Nirvana or in the cynicism of the later Stoics. The Græco-Roman world was thus prepared, by the time of Christ, for the union of subjective and objective religion in a higher synthesis. Judea was especially prepared, for ancient Israel had come through Henotheism (recognition of other gods as real, but worship of Jehovah only,) to spiritual Monothe-

ism. The prophets represented subjective religion—God in the heart. Third, consciousness of the Absolute, as the principle of union between the Not-Self and the Self, reveals moral obligation as an expression of the universal relations of mankind. This last stage reached its perfection in Christ, beyond which religious progress is possible only by the fuller comprehension of him.

The application of evolution, or the idea of development, may interfere with the old theology, but not with the old faith. It makes the conception of inspiration more intelligible. It helps us to understand many utterances of Paul which embody the idea of development. It sounds a note of optimism, for evolution means that the world is improving. It will lead to a more just appreciation of heathen religious leaders. It will stimulate the interest in foreign Christian missions, which are an agency for carrying the process of religious development on to its normal consummation.

The discussion was opened by S. T. Willis, who feared that this conception of religion left no place for revelation or miracles and made it a "mere" growth from Hebrew and Greek religions. The critic guarded his criticism with a series of "ifs," but why he even supposed that the essayist meant to exclude God when he introduced growth, it is hard to say, for it was distinctly stated in the beginning of the paper that "evolution is God's way of doing things," and that "God is the resident force" which carries on the process. A growth which is God's way of accomplishing his eternal purpose is probably not a "mere" growth, within the usual meaning of the term.

Prof. Silas Jones said, "The conception of evolution is helpful if it helps." It is a question of fact, of experience. The bulk of testimony is that it does help. Ethical ideas and forms of worship have developed. but Jesus was not an ordinary product of evolution. He is rather, as Fiske says, the Evolver himself.

Prof. C. L. Loos maintained that the miraculous birth of Jesus was an interruption of the evolutionary process. God is constantly coming in as a factor, thus destroying the continuity of evolution. This would be true if it were assumed that continuity means godlessness; but not if God is the "resident force," "the Evolver."

Prof. Hugh McDiarmid suggested that the theory of evolution is itself an evolution, and therefore probably not yet complete. It may be only in the monad condition. Let us then wait, he said, until it is fully developed before accepting it. On the contrary, if the thing is going to evolve any farther, if ultimate truth lies still beyond, let us make haste to get in the procession before we are everlastingly left behind. It is as if the mollusk should have said, when the evolution of the fish was taking place, "No, I will not evolve into a fish. The thing won't stop there. There may be mammals after awhile. I'll wait and be a mammal all at once." In fact, no one claims that the doctrine of evolution is the finality of all truth, but only that it is the best scientific doctrine now available.

The general discussion was participated in by J. H. Garrison, who pointed out the fact that the laws of development are different in the physical and spiritual realms; W. T. Moore, who told a humorous and appropriate story; J. B. Briney, who told another which was less successful in both respects; B. C. Deweese, who objected to calling Paul an evolutionist; L. I. Mercer, who distinguished between the evolution of religion and the evolution of revelation; and W. J. Loos, who thought that an evolution which admits miracles (as Wallace, La Conte, Drummond and others do) was not new enough to be worth much.

Evolution and the Doctrine of Redemption was the subject of the paper read Wednesday morning by Professor W. Douglas Mackenzie, of Chicago Theological Seminary, C. L. Loos being in the chair. Prof. Mackenzie spoke of the revolutionary changes which had been wrought in the world's thought during the past half century by the idea of evolution. The crisis which it has brought on is similar to the crisis to which earlier scientific discoveries have led, and it is no more to be feared than they. No doctrine of the history of nature which science may compel us to accept can possibly conflict with religion. Tyndall, who tried to blot out Christianity with evolution, has already been supplanted by Fiske, a Christian evolutionist. Does evolution confirm or destroy the central doctrine of Christianity —redemption? The speaker again emphasized the important distinction (mentioned above) between evolution as a science, represented by Darwin, and evolutionary philosophies, represented by Spencer. The former did not touch the question of origins, or the nature and meaning of the force which carries on the process. Darwin spoke timidly and not as a scientist when he referred to the origin of substance and the beginning of life; as a scientist he tried only to account for the differentiation of species. For Spencer, Darwinism is a mere detail; he tries to explain the essence of nature, not the relations of its parts. This is not science, however often he may call it that. Science can only describe things. It can not define matter, life, force or self-consciousness. Darwinism may be scientifically established; Spencer's agnostic philosophy based on scientific evolution cannot be proved because it is philosophy and may be wrong even if the principles of scientific evolution are right. The acceptance of evolution does not carry with it the acceptance of Spencer's philosophy.

It is not a question of choice between accepting the evolutionary theory or going back to the old theory of instantaneous creation of all species. The latter had already broken down in the hands of Linnæus before evolution was suggested.

When LaConte referred the development of things to "resident forces," he transgressed the limits of science and made an incursion into philosophy. Science cannot locate or explain forces; it can only tell what changes occur. A better definition would be that "evolution is continuous, progressive change of phenomena according to certain laws." The idea of progress is here emphasized, and this means divine foresight. Purpose is progress viewed from the Godward side.

Great principles are to be studied in their beginnings (not their causes) far back in history. There are foreshadowings of ethics in nature. Nature is shot through with facts of love and self-sacrifice the same in kind as those in human life. The cross of Christ runs through all nature; its principle is eternal and leads up to the actual sacrifice. Evolution and redemption are not two theories, but two series of facts, two ranges of experience, both human or for man, both divine or from God. The doctrine of redemption includes and presupposes: first, the divine Christ, whom his apostles constantly identified with the God of nature, the Logos, the principle and origin of the whole evolutionary process; second, the cross, which shows that the ideas of love and law are not inharmonious, and which procures redemption by presenting the law in such a way as to make it lovable, thus bringing one back to the law of his being, departure from which is sin; third, the spirit of Christ now at work in social evolution through the agency of his church.

The discussion was opened by J. J. Haley, who said that the general theory of evolution is true and as a conception of the universe it has come to stay. We are all practical evolutionists in spite of ourselves. A necessary theological reconstruction is being accomplished rather by a change of emphasis than by the introduction of absolutely new ideas. God's immanence is not a new discovery, but its importance in our total conception of the divine nature is new. Deism had driven God out of the universe. The conception of Him as an occasional visitor is no longer possible. Darwinism sets before us two alternatives: either He is everywhere in nature, or He is nowhere. The incarnation and redemption gain new meaning from the thought of God's constant connection with nature and history.

Obviously with a desire to have the anti-evolutionary view stated, I. B. Grubbs was given fifteen minutes, though his name was not on the program. He admitted that evolution might be consistent with somebody's idea of redemption — Prof. Mackenzie's for example—but not with the biblical idea of remission of sins. Evolution, he said, taking it even at its own estimate of itself, provides only for the future and not for the forgiveness of past sins. The idea is growing that all that is needed is to build character and this he denounced as pharisaism.

The program called for no more speeches but for questions which Prof. Mackenzie would answer. But it was not easy for even so stern a chairman as Prof. Loos to shut off those who had speeches to make. Prof. Fairhurst alternated with all the other speakers to the end. The chief point at issue was whether or not the introduction of such supernatural events as the incarnation, the resurrection of Christ and the miracles, breaks the continuity which is essential to the idea of evolution. Prof. Mackenzie said that it does not, and stated Wallace's theory of the introduction of new causes from time to time—as at the beginning of life — which suspend no previously existing law, but which lead to effects not causally contained in the earlier phenomena. A miracle is never the breaking of a law but the operation of a force which is always in accordance with law. Others who had questions to ask were B. C. Hagerman, J. B. Briney and Jabez Hall. Bro. Briney wanted to know again how the creation of Adam before Eve, as recorded in Genesis, could be reconciled with the evolutionary statement, and Prof. Mackenzie in turn asked how the statement that "the Lord sitteth upon the circle of the heavens" can be reconciled with the Copernican astronomy.

In closing Prof. Mackenzie spoke earnestly of the troubles which come from asserting that Christianity is inconsistent with evolution or with any other scientific theory. When the alternative is presented to thoughtful young people between rejecting the scientific theory, which is held by the great majority of scientists, and rejecting Christianity, seven out of ten will reject Christianity and the other three will have an uncomfortable and disturbing experience. We have no right to place such an alternative as a stumbling-block to the acceptance of Christianity. Prof. Mackenzie's able address brought the discussion of the religious bearings of evolution to a fitting consummation. He did not, of course, try to prove the scientific theory of evolution. The discussion of that question before a religious congress would be quite impossible. But he showed that it does not conflict with Christian faith, that it can be made the basis for a theistic explanation of the universe as well as of an agnostic philosophy, and that its application to the great doctrines of Christianity leads to a firmer establishment and truer understanding of them.

Wednesday afternoon, with A. B. Philputt in the chair, C. C. Rowlison presented a paper on The Psychology of Religious Experience.

In this, as in the preceding address, the evolutionary standpoint was adopted. The speaker did not even shrink from the term "the reign of law," but said that, as law reigns in the material world, making possible the sciences of physics and chemistry, so the reign of law in the world of mind makes possible such sciences as pedagogy and a science of the phenomena of religious experience. It is the business of the latter to explain religion by the laws of the human mind. In making this last statement, the speaker laid himself open to criticism more severe than any which was made upon him in the subsequent discussion. The term "explain" calls for explanation, and when one speaks of applying psychology to the task of explaining religion, the statement should be guarded by the warning that, since psychology is a science and not a philosophy, it can only describe and classify the phenomena of religious consciousness and cannot explain them in the sense of finding their efficient causes. This is the sense in which Mr. Rowlison probably meant his statement to be taken.

The paper was largely occupied with reviews of some recent books in which the psychology of religious experience has been for the first time seriously treated. Starbuck's "Psychology of Religion" begins with a consideration of the age of conversion on the basis of statistics and concludes that conversion is a phenomenon normally connected with adolescence and that its failure to come at that time means arrested development. This implies that religion is normal to man. Among the motives to conversion in the many cases which he examined, fear has a large part, and hope, love of God and the altruistic sentiments generally a small part. Since conversion comes naturally at a certain time, it is not necessary to create emotional excitement to bring it about; the attempt should rather be to secure a normal psychological development which will include conversion as a part of it. Coe's "Studies of the Spiritual Life" says that the characteristics of adolescence are the main point in the psychology of religion. To say that conversion is concomitant with the period of most active physical growth and its accompanying phenomena does not mean that it is produced by physical causes. What is needed is less stimulation than guidance. The position of the Disciples of Christ on conversion is psychologically correct because it does not give to disturbed individuals a still greater emotional disturbance but sets before them a definite act. Granger's "The Soul of a Christian" was referred to at some length and statements of Ribot and Sabatier were quoted, expressing the idea that religion is a thing normal to man and an inborn necessity. Problems which are raised by this study of the psychology of religion are: What is the relation between adolescence and conversion? To what extent is the storm-and-stress period through which many young persons pass dependent upon physical conditions or temperament?

The discussion of the paper was opened by S. M. Jefferson who consumed fifteen minutes without approaching any point of importance raised by the paper. Most of his time was devoted to the criticism of a mixed metaphor and an accidental misuse of the words "warp" and "woof." Mr. Rowlison had spoken of weaving the "woof of truth" into the "warp of character" and Prof. Jefferson took pains and time to point out that the warp is woven into the woof, not vice versa. He approached serious criticism when he made the point that an antecedent is not necessarily a cause and that consequently it does not follow that the physical phenomena of adolescence cause conversion even though they may precede or accompany it. This is a vital point, to which it was well enough to call attention again, though it had been stated by the first speaker.

J. A. Lord held that the subject was one of great practical importance and made the important suggestion that the records of personal religious experience, upon which Starbuck bases his generalizations, exhibit experiences warped by a wrong theology. It is this which causes fear to appear so prominent among the motives assigned in conversion. Fear is not a normal element in conversion. A collection of statistics among the Disciples of Christ would show it less prominent and would exhibit fewer emotional disturbances. It was agreed by the Congress that it would be desirable to have such statistics collected among the Disciples of Christ and A. M. Harvuot and C. C. Rowlison were appointed to collect and collate such statistics.

At the close of this session the Congress resolved itself into an educational convention to receive the report of a committee appointed at the General Convention at Kansas City with reference to the organization of an American Christian Educational Society.

The report, which was read by F. D. Power, recommended the organization of such a society and presented a constitution. The report was adopted and about thirty charter memberships were taken. At a later session the general officers of the Society, with F. D. Power as president, and twelve directors, were elected. The Board was located at Washington, D. C. It is to be the duty of the Educational Society to carry on a campaign of education for a more general acquaintance with our educational needs, to formulate educational policies and to raise funds for the assistance both of colleges and of needy students. The Society, therefore, differs from the former Board of Education in having its function clearly defined and it will not be necessary at every meeting to raise the question, What is the Society for?

The Wednesday evening session was under the auspices of the Home Missionary Society, with Mark Collis as chairman. B. L. Smith made a brief statement to the effect that the Home Society is at present $18,000 ahead of its receipts by this time last year, and he had just received news of a $5,000 bequest which was ready as soon as he could go for it. He has already gone and has doubtless got it by this time.

The address of the evening was by Dr. Josiah Strong, of New York, on

The Twentieth Century City.

The problem of the twentieth century is the problem of the city—on the political side, its government; on the religious side, its evangelization. There are three reasons for the increasingly rapid growth of cities: The use of machinery on the farm makes it possible for fewer men to cultivate a given area and thus drives the unemployed from the rural districts; the growth of factories in the city provides employment and draws the rural unemployed to the city; the railroad furnishes the means not only of getting from the country to the city but of getting food to the city to feed those who gather there. This tendency is permanent and necessary. The amount of food which the world can consume is limited; but the consumption of articles of manufacture and fine arts is unlimited. Therefore as the world grows richer an increasing proportion of the population will find employment in manufactures and arts. In other words the city will grow. Already in 1890, three-fourths of the nation's wealth was in the city and the proportion is increasing. The larger the city, the greater the ability and rectitude needed to govern it; but the bigger our cities get, the worse are the men who rule. The proportion of the people who own their homes is less in the city than in the country. The proportion of churches is only half what it was fifty years ago. The amount of crime per capita is greater in city than in country and is increasing. Ignorance, vice and wretchedness separately are not revolutionary, but when combined they form social dynamite. To such an extent are these factors now dangerous that self-government has already been partly taken away from the cities by the state constitutions, because the cities are incapable of complete self-government. But when constant growth of the cities shall give them a majority of the people, as well as a majority of the money, this cannot be done. The government of the whole will then be in the hands of the city. What then, if it is now incapable even of self-government?

To make the city capable of self-government, make the citizen capable of it.

Cherish the patriotism which rallies around the ballot-box and the primaries, fights the machine and does not shirk jury service. There must be not only a development of patriotism but a transformation of character, and this is the work of a church. We have already plenty of methods; what we need is the application of them. Any institution makes a mistake when it tries to lift up a fraction of a man—either the physical, the intellectual or the spiritual part—for the man is a unit. The institutional church takes hold of the whole man. The Christian social settlement is a potent force and its open avowal of its Christianity does not drive men away from it. Bad as the conditions are in the cities, there is no occasion for panic, for the forces of redemption are adequate to the work.

Dr. Strong's address was enthusiastically received by an immense audience. There is no man in America who can use figures more effectively in a speech or make statistics more eloquent. The Congress was honored by his presence, as it was instructed and inspired by his address. It showed both the need and the method for city evangelization.

The Thursday morning's session was devoted to the discussion of various phases of the Christian union question. A. McLean was in the chair. The first paper was on by the writer of this article. The subject was treated by the historical method, the aim being to show what place the movement for unity occupies in church history in relation to the conception of the free individual. Individualism and unification have existed as tendencies throughout human history and have been embodied in varying degrees in all institutions. The history of individualism as related to the development of Christian institutions is summarized in three periods:

1. Medievalism ignored the individual. The two great institutions of the Middle Ages were the Holy Roman Empire and the Catholic Church. The theory was that these organizations did not receive their power from the individuals who composed them, but the individuals received from the organizations all their political and religious rights. The Catholic theory of the church rested upon the conception of the bishops as the criterion of the church, and the consensus of their opinions as the test of orthodoxy; and upon a conception of individual man as hopelessly lost by reason of his inherited original sin, except as he may be saved by divine grace, whose sole channel is the hierarchy. This establishes complete unity at the expense of the individual.

2. From the Reformation to the end of the eighteenth century is the period of awakening and developing individualism. The Reformation, as a revolution, implied the belief that individuals are of more value than any organization to secure unity at their expense. The casting off of external authority implies also faith in the sufficiency of internal authority to secure all the unity which may be necessary. The Reformation was therefore not only a temporary disruption of christendom, but also the prophecy of an ultimate and higher unity. The principle of individual liberty, opposed by the dogmatism of the first reformers, found expression in the multiplication of sects in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The philosophy of the Enlightenment and such mystical movements as Pietism, the Quakers and Wesleyanism, tried to find essential Christianity within the individual, the former by pure reason, the latter on the basis of feeling. Both failed and the end of the eighteenth century found individualism developed into a disintegration of both religious and political society.

3. The task of the nineteenth century has been to destroy anarchy without restoring tyranny; to find a basis for unity which will leave room for liberty. Alexander Campbell proposed to find a basis of unity neither in pure reason, nor in the emotions, nor in a complete biblical theology, but in a return to the authority of Christ for a statement of the conditions of salvation. Whether or not this method shall be adequate depends upon the interpretation of the word "authority." No authority can be permanently binding which is essentially external, whether it be authority of church or of book. The authority of the Bible may be endangered by a view which makes much of it as a code of laws and makes little of it as a source of light and inspiration. The problem is to be solved by finding our conception of authority in the Christ who is above us as Master and Lord and can yet dwell in the hearts of his disciples—a Christ whose deity is a manifestation of the immanent God. United in submission to this internal authority—the God in whom we live and move and is Christ dwelling in the heart—we shall be one and yet we shall be free.

The paper was discussed by George Darsie who directed attention to two points: the historical method and the conception of authority. The historical method he characterized as useful because dispassionate and conducive to a calm and unprejudiced view of facts. It has its limitations, however, in that it presents no duties and suggests no adequate motives to action. It is therefore a method to be used and even to be emphasized, because we have had too little of it in the past, but not to be used alone. The conception of authority as necessarily internal was criticised on the ground that purely biblical authority, although external, could never become coercive and could therefore never endanger liberty, as the authority of the church has done. In answer to this it may be said that the main point is not the coercion but the externality of the authority. An authority which is wholly without can enforce itself only by compulsion or threat. Authority can dispense with these aids only on condition that it makes such an appeal to the individual that the dictates of the authority are seen to be in accordance with the laws of his being; and when that point has been reached the authority has become essentially internal.

Following this, W. T. Moore read a paper on which unfortunately he was not able to finish within the hour allotted to him. The trend of the times, said Dr. Moore, is toward unity in every department of life and hence toward unity in the church. He set forth at length what had been the attitude of the Disciples of Christ toward the question in the past. They have been too anxious to swallow up all other churches. This desire is inconsistent and its accomplishment is impossible. The Disciples have contended for the right of individual interpretation of the Scriptures but have not granted that right to others, especially in regard to the ordinances. They have virtually had a creed all the time. The real difficulty in the union question centers in the baptismal question. This might be settled by a form of compromise which would abandon no principle that we have contended for and would conciliate the other bodies. As it is almost universally agreed that believer's immersion is apostolic baptism, whatever other forms may be, an agreement might be reached to practice only this henceforth, but meanwhile to accept in full fellowship all who are satisfied with their present baptism. The chief bar to union is that we do not want it badly enough. When the Christian world really wants to unite, it will unite.

A. M. Harvuot opened the discussion of Dr. Moore's paper. He opposed the idea of presenting any new plans for union and said that what we need is not schemes for union but the real desire for it. As a general criticism of the Congress, he said that we are making a mistake in substituting for our City Evangelization Conference a discussion of lesser matters "which make dreamers instead of soldiers." The distinction apparently was between questions which are immediately practical and deal with methods of work, and those which are intellectual and deal more or less with theories. In our opinion the criticism is entirely erroneous. We need not less conference on practical problems, to be sure, but we need sometimes to consider the great questions of which the world is thinking, without putting them to the test of immediate utility. Our Congress is an educational institution and the final test of education is its usefulness—a usefulness interpreted in no short-sighted fashion. No student goes through college without being compelled to study many things which he does not see how he will ever be able to apply in the practical work of his life. But they are not lost. We have been suffering many years for some occasion where we could have a brief season to think and talk about the larger problems of the thinking world, undistracted by immediate reference to their utility. The Congress meets a long-felt want in that respect and will turn out to be in the long run quite as useful as any conference on methods of work.

The general discussion of the two papers on Christian Union was participated in by J. A. Lord, J. H. Garrison, J. W. McGarvey and J. B. Briney. The general sentiment was that Dr. Moore had not correctly represented the position of the Disciples in the past, in saying that they had posed as "the whole thing," and that his scheme of union would not work.

Thursday afternoon was devoted to Woman's Work.

Mrs. St. Clair, of Columbia, Mo., was in the chair and brief addresses were presented by representatives of the sex. Miss Alice Lloyd spoke of "Woman in Modern Education," showing how the modern changes in the status of women have not been the result of mere chance but of changed conditions proceeding from economic developments. This has made education for women both possible and necessary. Some of its results are: material freedom springing from ability to earn one's own living; intellectual freedom; improved health, since study is less wearing than social dissipation; an increased spirit of democracy, woman being naturally aristocratic; not an unwillingness to marry but unwillingness to marry unworthy men; improvement in secondary education, which has come to be largely in the hands of women; and the application of the family method to care for the weaklings of society.

Mrs. J. M. Dill spoke of "Woman in the Church." The development of feminine influences and activities in religion was traced historically and a summary was given of those things which women can do now to best advantage.

Mrs. Ella Adams Moore, of the University of Chicago, spoke on "Woman in the Club." The woman's club is an educational force, an institution for the education of those who cannot utilize the schools. The club movement has grown up during the last thirty years and has spread so rapidly that increase in numbers is not now desirable. A club should counteract the dissipative effects of the habit of desultory reading, which is encouraged by the over-production of modern literature and especially by the over-abundance of newspapers. The club should promote systematic study and reading.

The latter part of the afternoon was devoted to a second address by Dr. Josiah Strong on Readjustment to New Industrial and Social Conditions.

We are in transition from an individual to a social type of civilization. The industrial changes of the nineteenth century grow largely from the substitution of mechanical for muscular power. On the basis of muscular power the world could never grow rich, for one set of muscles can just about provide for one person and those dependent on him. The introduction of mechanical power means increase of power without increase of mouths. The problem of production was thereby solved. What remains is the problem of distribution. Labor, which was individual and independent so long as it employed muscular power, became social and co-operative when machinery was used. The factory arises, trades are specialized and industries become interdependent. Life is more complex than formerly. This change in economic condition demands social changes, for there must be harmony between life and environment and when the latter changes the former must readjust or die. Some men and some churches have perished from lack of this readjustment; others have succeeded by means of it. The League for Social Service, of which Dr. Strong is president, aims to assist in this readjustment in all possible ways, having special regard to the problems which arise in cities. The aims and methods of the League were set forth at some length and there was a general agreement, when Dr. Strong had finished his exposition of its work, that it is among the most important agencies now at work for the purification of the social body.

Thursday evening the Congress came to its natural climax in the address by Prof. C. R. Henderson, of the University of Chicago, on Foreign Missions.

G. L. Wharton being in the chair. It was a splendid inspirational address, dealing with the need and the method of foreign missionary work. The spread of Christianity is obligatory upon us because Christianity is suitable for all men; because of the suffering and loss of heathen nations without it; because the church needs the stimulus which comes from such activity, and because Christ gave the command "Go." As to methods, it is essential that there be unity among Christians and whatever schemes may be proposed and may fail, unity is sure to come as soon as we are all in earnest about it. The outlook is hopeful; the law of the survival of the fittest prevails and the church must make itself fit to survive by making itself a fitting agent for the fulfillment of the world's greatest needs.

On this high plane the Congress closed.

Some Missionary Observations.

By Hugh McLellan.

The Foreign Society, and indeed the whole church, is anxiously awaiting the result of the collection for missions, taken on the first Lord's day in March. May we all see the largest manifestation of liberality in the history of the Christian Church. God grant that it may come full and free and beyond all expectation. May we all see of the travail of our souls and be satisfied. It is well, while we await the result, to enquire as to our conceptions of this collection. A money collection is not the noblest element of Christian missions. We might raise even the much heralded two hundred thousand dollars and still be woefully lacking in the best missionary impulses. Christ never commanded anyone to send the gospel; what he said was "Go and Preach the gospel." "Send the Light" is a fair missionary hymn but a weak missionary practice. Again, Christ never commanded his disciples to pay for laborers but to pray for laborers. We think of sending; the Lord thought of going. We think of paying; the Lord thought of praying. We dream of two hundred thousand dollars; the Lord dreamed of two hundred thousand laborers. Which is the nobler dream? As our dreams are, so are our realizations. We shall in all probability get the two hundred thousand dollars, but "Where are the reapers?"

It is to be hoped that the Foreign Society will substitute the word "laborers" for the word "dollars" in the motto for 1902. It is to be hoped also that there will be a praying day for laborers as well as a paying day. Then shall our eyes be enlightened and the Lord will teach our right arm terrible things. It is to be hoped, once more, that no parsimonious soul will misconstrue the spirit of these observations, and think that he can escape great obligations by some cheap praying. On the contrary it is the praying people that are the paying people. The church has not discharged its missionary obligations when it has taken an annual collection. The commission still rings with its inevitable go. Prayer is mightier than money; the goer is nobler than the sender. Foreign missions is more than a collection.

Mission Aftermath.

One of the very greatest efforts ever made in home missions in this country is now just over. The great simultaneous mission was planned beforehand during a whole year of careful and costly preparation by men accustomed to organization. It was a movement for the spiritual inauguration of the twentieth century. During one week at the end of January all the great suburbs of London as well as the city of London itself were attacked by pulpit stars, such as Dr. Parker, Campbell Morgan, Dr. Horton, Henry Varley, Gypsy Smith, Dr. Barrett and other leading lights of the Free Churches, as all Churches are called which are not connected with the State. During the first week in February another great assault on unbelief and indifference was initiated by a simultaneous mission in the rest of England. London came first, and the provinces had second turn. The religious public are now very eager to find out how much good has been done by this vast work. Thousands of meetings have been held. Crowds have assembled. Some of the missioners have magnified their own work by giving glowing reports of success. Others frankly speak in somewhat despondent style. That much blessing has been gained in countless quarters must be surely assumed. But I have lived long enough to know that the benefit of such attempts at evangelization is for the most part confined to the classes who do not need it nearly so much as the outlying masses. Moody and Sankey never really touched the enormous residuum of the British population. They greatly moved the churches and managed to a small extent to touch the fringe of the dark and heathenish millions outside all the churches. I think I know the reason.

The Reason Why.

As I think I know, may I say what seems to me to be the reason? When Mr. Moody came again and again to England, he always persistently refused to include the whole of the apostolic program in his teaching. He said to one of my friends who interviewed him and pressed him for a definite reply to a question on baptism, "I am a pedobaptist." This was the first time such an admission had been drawn from him. It was printed in the Christian Commonwealth, in a report of the interview. That tardy statement, dragged, as it seemed to the interviewer, very reluctantly from the famous evangelist, greatly astonished and distressed the Baptists in this country, for they had been constantly setting forth that Mr. Moody had been immersed in America, only that the immersion had been a semi-private or very obscure occasion. When this flat contradiction was administered the English Baptists were thunderstruck, and they were deeply disappointed in Mr. Moody, as well as pained that they had been misled by rumors about his supposed baptism. Now, although in England the ordinance of immersion is intensely unpopular, yet I venture to say that when any man of genius or power at any time arises in this country, who is not afraid, or ashamed, or too ignorant, to proclaim it in its proper place as commanded by Jesus Christ, at once the people overcome their repugnance so far as to cease their opposition. They bow to the man because of his eloquence, his power and his goodness. Spurgeon was an example amongst the Baptists. M. D. Todd was an instance amongst the Disciples. I remember how he came to Chester while I was the young Baptist minister there. For three months he avoided mentioning baptism, and he told me why. Then he burst forth with a magnificent argumentative declamation on the subject. He created a tremendous sensation. I shall never forget my joy when I heard of this. I hastened to congratulate him both privately and publicly. From that time many who had been attending his services walked no more with him; but he had gained such a mighty hold that he went forward with a fine following. Now, if some great revivalist were to arise in this country, or to come to this country—a star of the first magnitude, who would fearlessly trumpet forth the whole Jerusalem gospel, without eliminating in the style of Moody and Sankey and some others just what happens to be a cross for the emotional, superficial, muddled, modern religionists, then a new apostolic era would begin. Shall I see such a man come along before I die? When we think we have spied such a man and send him word we wish he could come across we are apt to get a reply stating that he must bring a singer with him and promise him a thousand pounds. Of course this is impossible. So we wait, and wait, and wait. No second-rate evangelist can gain this grand victory. A consecrated Napoleon is wanted. Hitherto most of the popular evangelists have owed their success partly to their power, but equally to their skill and prudence in pandering to popular objections to the mortifying and crucifying element in the gospel. Consequently the devil only retreats till the evangelist is gone and comes back again with some of the increments of the old devilry in his train. Thousands of people are lying around in every neighborhood who were years ago "converted," but who never really gained the saving truth. They did not convert. So it will be after this great united mission. Things will be very much as before.

Something I Have Read.

As I have visited Turkey, both European and Asiatic, I take intense interest in the appalling Sultan and his dominions. That Moslem Nero whose long and immune rule on the Bosphorus is one of the most mysterious arrangements of God's ever-inscrutable providence, is to my mind the real Antichrist of these days. There are many Antichrists, says the Apostle John. But there can scarcely be one thought of who could match the incarnation of Apollyon now on the throne of the Kalifs. My impressions about Turkey have been renewed, deepened and confirmed by reading a new book called "Turkey in Europe," by a writer who hides his personality under the pseudonym "Odysseus." Whoever this author may be, he knows his subject and handles it better than any writer of recent years on the near East. His respect for the individual Turk as a brave, honest, truthful, clean, dignified, hospitable oriental is profound. His feeling as to the regeneration of Turkey is one of utter despair. The Turkish empire is past all hope of any kind of reform. The Turk is the same fanatic as of old. His bigotry is invincible. He is diabolically cruel when his fanaticism is once aroused. He lives in the past and has no notion of a future which involves progress. There is no kind of aristocracy or nobility in Turkey. The Sultan has no wives, for he only cohabits with slaves, any of whom become princesses if they have sons. Therefore no order of nobility can arise. The middle class is entirely official. What has all this to do, my readers may ask, with a letter on "English Topics," written for American friends? It has this much to do with it, that both America and England have vital and precious interests in this beautiful land of the near East. These interests are destined ere long to cause considerable excitement. I was much impressed with what I saw and heard in Turkey of American missions, and I was greatly delighted with Bro. Johnson, my old friend, during his visit to England last autumn. He loves his work at Smyrna. The field may be difficult, but Turkey is an empire which should be occupied by as many of the Disciples as can be sustained there. It contains more of the Bible lands than any other part of the world. The Christian populations are themselves corrupt and ignorant in Turkey. It is a blunder to say that if we are not converting the Moslems in Turkey we are doing nothing. The first thing to do is to evangelize the Christian peoples—the Armenians, Greeks, Romanists and Nestorians. All these are easy to reach because they dread the Turk. The nominally Christian populations of the East form the finest missionary field I know of. What Americans have done in Turkey has been marvelous. Roberts College at Constantinople was the real maker of Free Bulgaria. Dr. Washburne trained the best of the young Bulgarian statesmen. Think of such a record as that; and never forget the life and work in Turkey of that marvelous man, Dr. Cyrus Hamlin. The English have done not nearly so much in Turkey as the Americans. The reason is that England has sought to exercise political influence. She has in many ways been constrained to do so. But America has cultivated moral and spiritual interests, and so her influence is of a far deeper and more potent kind. The gospel is the one hope of Turkey, and England and America are the two nations which alone can give this fallen oriental empire of the Padishah this regenerating boon. I make these observations because I have heard at times hints of discouragement on the part of Disciples as to missions in Turkey. Brethren, never let your sentiments of sympathy with such men and women as Bros. and Sisters Shishmanian, Chapman, and Johnson flag for a moment. The future of the East will be one of romantic and thrilling importance in relation to the West. England and the United States failed alike in paramount duty to Armenia in the dark and dreadful day of atrocities. Ere long a loud call will come again to the West. That cry must be heeded. American brethren and sisters, are you noting the telegrams from Macedonia, Servia and Bulgaria? Do you not mark that this eastern question "never downs"? It never will. The Bible lands belong to Christ. They were given to Abraham. Predestinating prophecy settles our minds as to the doom of the eastern Antichrist. Macedonia is fermenting. Trouble is near at hand.

Atmospheric Balm.

I sit writing these lines during the last hours of February, feeling in the air premonitory spring fragrance. The winter is past. England is a flowery land and we are looking for the floral carpet to burst up in its beauty like some little heaven efflorescing from earth. We read terrific items of the American winter, which are paralleled by the descriptions from the Continent. But England lies lapped in the embrace of the genial Gulf Stream. We have had our little spells of cold, but they have never been severe. We have had murky fog and gloomy rain; but we never have any of these atmospheric samples for long at a time. We welcome spring which with us is a long season. We do not rush into summer as you do. We have to be content to be without strawberries for weeks after yours are all consumed, but when they do come along they are wonderful! Each land has its advantages. The best thing I know about England and America is that each of these countries as history unfolds becomes dear to the other. The two nations are learning to know each other better and better and to appreciate each other's characteristics more and more. So much the better. For these two same peoples are destined to contend side by side for the welfare of the race and the liberties of oppressed races. WILLIAM DURBAN.

Present Tokens of Christian Unity.

By Herbert L. Willett.

The people who by their very program and history are interested in the advance of Christian unity must watch with attention the signs of the growth of such a sentiment in the Christian world about them. Notable advances have been made in the last half century in the unifying of all Christian forces for the common struggle with evil in the world. Not a little of the influence resulting in this unification is due to the work of our own people, or rather to the sentiment created by them in their protest against disunion as not only a misfortune but a sin. That they have been the sole cause of the rapid growth of union sentiment which has manifested itself abundantly during the last decade, they can not and would not claim; but they may at least be credited with a due measure of the influence which has hastened this desirable end.

Recognition and Co-operation; not Absorption.

But it is not always the case that we note with due attention the signs of progress in the very feeling which most concerns us, and the limitation of our propaganda to sermons on the practicability of Christian union may prevent our seeing tokens of the growing results of an end which we have evermore sought. It is to be feared that we sometimes fall into the danger of confining our view of Christian unity to organic union, which means practically the absorption of other religious bodies into our own, and fail to see that this is neither practicable nor, indeed, desirable; and that we must give due diligence to the task of reaching a more practical form of unity through a strengthening of the bonds of fellowship, bringing all men into a closer companionship with our Lord and therefore with each other. Perhaps we may gather some hints of the form which the sentiment of unity will ultimately take in its outward expression by watching the movements already perceptible in the Christian bodies around us, looking toward this desired end.

Dr. Stalker has recently observed that unity is a term which may cover a good many things. There is first the unity of all brethren in Christ, and it is no inconsiderable gain if this is recognized as the common possession of the true members of all churches, and as the invisible basis of all external union. Then there is recognition by the churches of each other's work and character; and one may certainly feel that it would be a gratifying change if the different communions of the church of Christ, instead of ignoring and depreciating one another's success and each magnifying its own, were quick to acknowledge every sign of the presence of the Holy Spirit. Then there may be co-operation or confederation. This is being tried in various places and with ever increasing promise of good. Lastly, the perfect attainment would be incorporating or organic union. No one of these schemes is exclusively effective. All of them, and perhaps others, must be utilized in the attempt to realize the end which we seek; but every effort in this direction by any of these methods hastens the ultimate triumph for which the Disciples of Christ have evermore hoped.

The Federation of Churches.

One of the interesting expressions of the sentiment is found in the growing movement known as the "Federation of the Churches of America." It was organized in 1885 in New York, but grew to such proportions and usefulness that five years later it was believed to be wise to establish a national committee to promote the formation of local and state federations. The New York State Federation was organized last autumn, and in February a conference was held in Philadelphia looking to the extension of the movement, and delegates were present representing the different sections of the country and the various Christian agencies, such as the Evangelical Alliance, the Bible societies, and local federations. The result of this gathering was the organization of the "National Federation of Churches and Christian Workers," whose task it is to secure the formation of local federations in all places where such action is feasible, and thus to secure co-operation among churches and Christian workers throughout the United States for the effective promotion of the interests of the kingdom. Its plan of membership is very broad and may include any body of people whose interests are collateral with the ends proposed. Already the federations in such cities as Chicago, St. Louis and Kansas City are growing into effectiveness and give promise of great results in economy of resources in city mission work and the extension of the kingdom of Christ to the unreached.

The Grindelwald Conferences.

Every one recalls the interesting religious conferences which were organized some ten years ago by Dr. Lunn, and held at Grindelwald, Switzerland. They had for their theme the possibility of the union of British Protestant Christendom. Perhaps the time was too early to expect anything like cordial co-operation between the Established Church and the Free Churches, or those not supported by the State. At any rate the conferences had only a limited measure of success, in directing public attention to the need of greater unity in Christian work. But out of those conferences has grown the Church Congress of Nonconformists, which has since been regularly held, with representatives of all the evangelical Free Churches, including Presbyterian, Congregational, Baptist, Methodist, Friends, the Salvation Army and all others who desire to participate upon a representative basis. These conferences have grown in influence until they have resulted in the establishment of Free Church Councils in the different cities of England, and these local councils already number something more than six hundred. Their purpose is to cultivate closer organization in union evangelistic work, and to consider questions relating to the moral, intellectual and social welfare of the people. The Free Church Councils in England, whose organization seemed to many impracticable at first, have now come to vindicate their formation and to be recognized as one of the great religious forces of Great Britain.

Free Church Councils.

An example of their activity and influence is to be seen in the recent "Free Church mission" held in London and later extended to the provinces. The Free Church Councils took up the task of holding a "simultaneous mission" of revival services in all the districts in the city of London, and secured for this purpose convenient halls and churches and the best preaching talent they could summon. The series of meetings, which continued a week, was introduced by a great municipal gathering at the Guild Hall addressed by Dr. Parker on the suitable text: "When he saw the multitude, he was moved with compassion." The different ministers participating in this widely spread evangelistic movement were Mr. Gypsy Smith, an evangelist of exceptional power, Rev. John McNeill, Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, Rev. J. H. Jowett, Dr. Clifford, Rev. Sylvester Horne, Dr. Munro Gibson and others of similar prominence in all the denominations. Great results were obtained in the matter of hearing, but it was felt that a week was too short a time to test the plan. It is safe to say that hereafter the simultaneous mission will be an annual enterprise, and that it will be extended in its scope and effectiveness in ways suggested by this experience. England is slow to accept a new thing, and yet it is significant that even the London Times in a leading article speaks with respect and sympathy of this great work. The movement spread to the other cities of the country, and at last reports, Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool and other centers were enjoying great meetings conducted on the plan of those in the metropolis.

Union in Scotland.

Interest has already been excited by the union of the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church in Scotland. This is an example of actual in corporation and organic union; and it appears that the unifying sentiment is spreading to still other quarters. It is understood that plans have already been made for a meeting in the spring between Baptists and Independents, or Congregationalists as they are known in America. This meeting has for its purpose the discussion of the possibility of union between these two chief representatives of the congregational form of organization on English soil. It is a notable sign of the times when brethren of different bodies come thus together with a view of cementing their relations and obliterating their differences. One can only hope that the results of this meeting may be satisfactory to all concerned, and may promote the interests of the kingdom of God.

The Disciples of Christ and Unity.

It is not, however, to conferences and resulting platforms that we can look with much expectation of Christian unity, for it has been largely the history of such gatherings that they have magnified rather than covered the differences between the participants. Christian unity can never be realized as the result of formal declarations, except as these are the consummation of actual fellowship already enjoyed. There is a certain value, no doubt, in drafting plans for the unity of the church, such as those proposed by the Lambeth-Chicago committee, or by the Disciples of Christ through their committee on Christian union which had an existence for several years. But the real task of Christian union lies closer to the soil. It can only be realized through the active and sympathetic efforts of a people heartily believing in the idea and committed to its promotion.

Such a people as our own, with the forces at our disposal, with our large and growing representation in all parts of the country, could take such active steps toward the promotion of this great end as would hasten by leaps and bounds the consummation of that union which constitutes the Apostolic ideal. It is not merely by preaching the doctrine of Christian union on the Apostolic basis that this end can be reached; for we secure only a very partial hearing, and too frequently our conduct gives a direct and sharp negative to all our pleas for the union of the people of God. It is not by proclaiming Christian union and acting as narrow and selfish sectarians, as is too frequently the case in our churches, that we can expect to influence the Christian world. If, in the cities where we exist, we would take thought to promote with our well-known zeal and enthusiasm all those unifying movements which lie at hand, we should compel the Christian world to take seriously our plea, where to-day it regards us too frequently as a sect as belligerent and polemical as any other, and yet, strangely enough, insisting evermore upon Christian unity.

Let Us Be Leaders.

There is no reason why our churches everywhere should not be the prominent agencies in union work of all types, such as union evangelistic services, union Bible study lectureships and associations, union civic and social reforms, and such efforts as the exchange of preachers and the intervisitation of congregations, which do more than anything else to promote the spirit of love among the people of God. Nor shall we by such efforts lose our clear and emphatic testimony to Apostolic Christianity. We shall both exemplify it and vindicate our claim to be its exponent. With our strength and aggressiveness we have the ability to make Christian union a practical reality in every city where we exist. We have no other task than to emphasize this great ideal and to become the organizing agencies of its manifestation. If we have a specialty, we should be working at it in such a manner as to convince the world that we believe in it. Otherwise we merely assume the air of another and unnecessary denomination, with the added anomaly of holding out an undenominational banner. Christian union will be realized at length, either under our leadership or independent of us. If we miss the opportunity of leadership in the cause which we have championed, we share the fate of all those movements which, starting with a vital plea, have degenerated into a mere denomination, and at length have lost their lives, because they were unwilling to work persistently and unremittingly at the great task for which they came into being.

THE PHILIPPINES: The Land and the People

By LESLIE N. COLLINS, Comp. B, 6th U. S. Infantry

CONCLUDED

There are two classes of buildings here in Bacolod. It is not wholly a native town. The chief building material of the natives is bamboo. Lumber is scarce and very expensive, owing to the slow and laborious process of sawing the logs into lumber. They have no saw-mills, but employ a baby hand-saw and rip it off at an exceedingly slow rate. The bamboo houses are called "shacks." They are made entirely of bamboo and many of them are neat and tidy in appearance. The larger and more costly buildings are Spanish, and of the style of architecture which was in vogue long ago. They are quite large and square in form and very roomy with big sliding windows on all sides. The window frames contain no glass but are set with transparent fish scales about four inches square. This gives the houses a gloomy, prison-like appearance when the windows are closed. The floors are all of the finest and best mahogany. The lumber of which these floors are made, if in the United States, would be very valuable. The wide folding doors are also made of this same favorite and costly material. However, it does not seem to be very costly here, for the natives use this beautiful mahogany mixed with ebony for firewood.

These Philippine islands have countless riches in this one article of wood alone, and some day the world will be startled, and that portion of it called Spain perhaps chagrined, at the revelation of immense and inexhaustible mineral wealth locked up in their mountain ranges. For, as sure as time lasts, these beautiful and valuable woods, which now adorn the Philippine hills, and these vast storehouses of gold and precious metals locked up in the mountains are certain to win for these verdant isles a golden crown. The indolent and uncultured natives—made so, perhaps, by long years of cruelty and oppression—have no conception of the vast wealth that lies about them and beneath their feet, and are wholly incapable of developing it, even if they were aware of its existence.

I have been studying the war in the Philippines, not only from the standpoint of an American soldier, but from the standpoint of a believer in all legitimate human progress, from the standpoint of right and justice for all concerned, and in the bsst interests of these islanders themselves, and the world at large. Here in the Philippines I have had an opportunity to study the situation as it really is, and not from hearsay. After several months of careful observation, and a study of the manners, habits and capacities of the natives, I have reached a conclusion —which seems to me irresistible from these premises—that the occupation of these verdant and valuable isles by the United States is the best thing possible both for the natives and for the United States. Best for the natives, because it means their enlightenment and civilization, the permanent amelioration of their social and moral condition, and possibly their ultimate christianization also; best for the United States, for as certain as we hold these valuable islands, we will some day, not far away, tap these fountains of incalculable wealth which lie unopened in these beautiful summer isles.

It would be foolishness for the United States to withdraw her army and abandon these islands at the present time. It would not only involve a great financial loss to our government, representing many millions of dollars, but it would also be a great calamity to the natives themselves; for it is certain, if these dusky islanders are ever to be rescued from their present wretched and deplorable condition of poverty, ignorance and immorality, the United States must do it. We are their natural deliverers. In the mysterious providence of God, and wholly unsought by us, we have been placed in this responsible position, and we cannot and dare not be unfaithful to the trust divine providence has imposed upon us.

All talk about these ignorant, depraved and semi-civilized natives being capable of self-government is pure bosh. No one who is really acquainted with the situation as it exists here entertains any such absurd ideas. It will take a century of culture and discipline to prepare these people to take their place among the self-governing nations of the world, and there is no nation on this earth so well qualified and equipped to do this uplifting and civilizing work as the United States. The genius of our free institutions, the opportunity our government offers to the worthy, industrious and aspiring, fit and qualify it to faithfully and effectually perform this philanthropic work. Time is bound to vindicate both the wisdom and humanity of President McKinley's Philippine policy.

Every town in the Philippines has a large Catholic church. In fact there are no other churches here so far as I have seen. When the Filipinos attend church the men always go first, and the women and children follow. A husband never attends church with his wife, and church-going young men have no opportunity of escorting their sweethearts home after the services. These people seem to have the Chinese contempt for women, and act as though they thought it a disgrace to speak to a woman in public. When a native goes out for a stroll, he usually takes the entire family with him and they walk in single file, with the lord and master of the household in the lead.

There are no American horses here on the island of Negros. They cannot endure the climate, but there are plenty of island ponies and they are quite cheap; a good one can be bought for thirty dollars. The native carriages have only two wheels, but in larger cities, such as Iloilo and Manila, there are plenty of four-wheeled vehicles. The lower class use caribous and bulls in place of horses, and you can hear an old two-wheeled ox cart squeak three blocks away. For real genuine incarnated patience, I think the wearied-looking caribou holds the record. Even the immortal Job never in his most patient mood surpassed a Philippine caribou in the exercise of this peculiar virtue. However, he is not the mildest mannered beast in the world when he is thoroughly aroused. At such times he becomes the most unreasoning and unmanageable brute I have ever seen. A caribou is as large as a full grown buffalo; indeed they are called "water buffaloes." Their eyes are large, black and wild, and their two powerful horns grow backward, giving them a vicious look. They are guided by a single rope fastened to a ring in the nose. One jerk for the right and three for the left. It takes a skilled hand to drive a caribou and one possessed of infinite patience also.

Cock-fighting is the leading sport of the Filipinos; indeed it might be said, without either stretching or sacrificing the truth, that the average Filipino thinks more of his chickens than he does of his wife and children. Every town has a large cock-pit and I have myself witnessed some pretty fierce fights. I had no idea that a chicken could put up such a game fight as these Philippine cocks do. If left to themselves they usually fight till one or the other is killed.

On Sundays the natives all attend church first and as soon as the services close they make a break for the cock-pit. It seems a natural and easy transition with the Filipinos to go from religious worship to a cock-fight. In our country the distance between a Christian church and a cock-pit is considerable. It is not so here, either geographically or morally.

The market is another interesting place to visit. It is a long bamboo shed where the natives barter and sell. They are all natural traders, and in some respects they remind one of American Indians; they are always ready for a "scrap" and, like the American aborigines, they are noted for their treachery.

The other day, while roaming aimlessly around through the woods, I foolishly shot a little monkey with my pistol. The poor little creature died just like a human being, with its little hands placed over the wound and a look of pain on its human-like face that would have melted the stony heart of an Egyptian king. I hope God will forgive me for my sin. I have promised him that so long as I remain in these islands, I will never kill another creature unless forced to do so in self-defense. I have often sat for hours at a time and watched with real pleasure and increasing interest these innocent, human-like little creatures in their native bowers. They please and delight, amuse and interest me more than anything else in the animal kingdom. There is so much in their actions and habits that is so strikingly human that we cannot fail to be interested by them. I am surprised at myself that I could ever have done such a thoughtless, cruel thing as to shoot one of these little inoffensive animals, but I'll never do the like again. That death scene in the Philippine woods has taught me a lesson I shall never forget. I did not come here to harm the innocent and I sincerely hope it will never fall to my lot to injure any of the inhabitants of these beautiful Edenic isles.

Bacolod, Negros, Philippine Islands.

Our Budget.

—Christ is risen.

—If ye be risen with Christ seek those things which are above.

—Let there be joyful, inspiring music and preaching in all the churches next Lord's day.

—It was a great Congress we had at Lexington, and it was also a sort of semi-annual national missionary convention.

—Several committees appointed at Kansas City met and discussed their work at Lexington, and will be the better prepared to report at Minneapolis next fall.

—Perhaps the most important of these committees was on the subject of an Educational Society. This committee met at Lexington, submitted its plan for the American Christian Education Society which the Congress, when turned into an Educational Society, unanimously endorsed. Members were solicited, officers were elected and also a board of twelve directors. For the present the board is located at Washington, D. C., and F. D. Power is its president. Fuller report of this society, its purpose and plan, will be given soon. It marks a distinct advance in our educational interests.

—When it was voted that the next Congress should go to Cleveland, Des Moines, Ia., through Prof. Lockhart, served notice that Des Moines was in the field as the place for the fifth Congress. That would be a good place for it in 1902, but in 1903, the Congress should be held in May and should be one of the religious features of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition in the city of St. Louis.

—F. D. Ferrell, of Pleasantville, Ia., claims that the Ladies' Aid Society of his church took possession of his residence one evening recently under false pretenses and piled eatables around until he could not do a thing. His protest at the time was of no avail. He has not yet entered his claim for damages.

—H. C. Patterson writes from Mishawauka, Ind.: "Have just received a telegram to come home at once. In an effort to save a child from a run-away team, my wife was run over, limb broken and shoulder crushed. My daughter is just up from a ten weeks' sickness. Our meeting here was just beginning to boom. Truly the shadows have been upon our home in the last three months." Brother Patterson not only has our sympathy in his trouble, but, we are sure, the sympathy of the large circle of friends who love him for his work's sake.

—The Eastern Iowa Christian Ministerial Association will hold its third annual meeting at Davenport, April 9-11. As already announced, the addresses will deal chiefly with sociology. Among the principal addresses are: "The Social Settlement," S. J. Carter; "The Social Teaching of the Sermons on the Mount," M. W. Williams; "The Relation of the Church to Social Progress," T. J. Dowe; "The Institutional Church," E. E. Lowe; "A Review of Gladden's 'Applied Christianity,'" N. G. Brown. There will also be addresses by G. W. Burch, J. P. McKnight and J. M. Rudy. Each paper will be followed by a review and open discussion.

—Special attention is called to the article on the Philippines, the second section of which is published this week. The writer, Mr. Collins, of Shelbyville, Ill., is a son of our widely known brother, Dr. A. M. Collins. He has now been in the Philippines several months. He was, among three or four others, selected from his regiment to serve as a sharp-shooter and scout, by reason of his skill with the rifle. In this capacity he has naturally seen more of the islands and has encountered more varied experiences than the ordinary soldier would in the same time. Mr. Collins is mighty with the pen as well as with the sword and is the author of a volume of poems.

—A preacher wishing a place can be put in correspondence with a church which employs a man for full time, owns a parsonage and can pay $500 or $600, by communicating with O. D. Maple, Cameron, Ill.

—The Moody Bible Institute, of Chicago, will hold its usual summer course in Bible study, music and practical work. Information may be obtained by addressing R. A. Torrey, Superintendent, 80 Institute Place, Chicago.

—J. D. Greer is now preaching half time at Kahoka, Mo., and half at Ursa, Ill. At the former place there have been 29 additions in the last year. At Mt. Sterling, Ia., where he preached half time last year, there were 30 additions.

—Stephen H. Zendt, Secretary of the Third Illinois Missionary District, announces that the churches of that district will hold their annual convention at Galesburg, April 30 to May 2. Prof. H. L. Willett will deliver a course of lectures during the convention. The full program will be announced soon.

—The church at Waterville, Wash., is in dire need of $2,500 to save its building, the only one which we have in north-central Washington. Instead of asking for money it is trying to earn it by acting as agent for the Peerless Atlas of the World and the Woman's Home Companion, giving the two together for $1.25. Of course everybody knows the magazine. Its price is $1.00 and it is worth it. The Atlas is a thoroughly practical and trustworthy work, well up to date. Christian friends anywhere will be doing a service to the church at Waterville and getting a good bargain for themselves by sending $1.25 to R. E. McKnight, Waterville, Wash., for the Atlas and magazine for one year.

—Special attention is called to the following statement of the receipts for foreign missions for the week ending March 28. Again there is a loss as compared with the receipts for the corresponding time last year—a smaller loss than that of last week and no loss at all in the number of contributing churches, but still a loss in money:

	1900	1901	Loss.
Amounts,	$6,744.03	$6,563.56	$180.47
Contributing churches,	350	350

Losses every week will never foot up to a gain for the year, and we must have that $200,000. We will still hope that churches have delayed sending their offerings, not by reason of any indifference, but because they wished to devote the whole month of March to the missionary campaign. We refuse to believe that there is any waning of zeal or liberality so long as the figures can be explained in any other way. But this theory of ours, that the churches have been working at their offerings throughout March, cannot be maintained much longer unless the receipts begin to give evidence of it. This is the crucial week and if receipts for the week ending April 4 do not show an increase, next week will be still more crucial. Remember that the collection is always in order until it has been taken and if your church is one of those whose delay has frightened us by an apparent loss, you ought to add 25 per cent. to pay for the wear and tear on the secretary's nervous system. Send money to F. M. Rains, Box 884, Cincinnati, O.

Scrofula

Is a disease as old as antiquity, and as young as the newest born infant.

It has infested the blood of humanity from ancient times down to the present minute.

It is hereditary or may be acquired.

It appears in swollen glands, scrofulous sores, hip disease, boils, pimples, eruptions, and, as believed by high authorities, even in the forms of catarrh and rheumatism.

It can be cured by taking Hood's Sarsaparilla faithfully and persistently.

We know this, because Hood's Sarsaparilla has done it.

It will cure you if you give it a trial.

You should begin to take it today.

Hip Disease—"I suffered from hip disease; had 5 running sores; used crutches and each winter I was confined to my bed for weeks at a time. Hood's Sarsaparilla has accomplished a perfect cure—saved my life. I have a good appetite and feel strong and well." ANNIE ROBERT, 49 Fourth St., Fall River, Mass.

In Her Eyes—"My little girl had scrofula and sores appeared in her eyes. A few bottles of Hood's Sarsaparilla entirely cured her and she has never had scrofula since." MRS. HOWARD POPE, Alpha, Oregon.

N. B. If you decide to take Hood's Sarsaparilla do not be induced to buy any other.

HOOD'S Sarsaparilla

Is sold by all druggists. Prepared only by C. I. HOOD & CO., Lowell, Mass.

—A critic, who has favored us recently with several anonymous communications in defense of Christian Science, thinks we do not preserve sufficient poise and calm when we say that St. Louis needs "a decent city administration," thereby implying that the present one is indecent. He says, "You never hear such language in the Christian Science publications of Boston," and suggests that we substitute "pure" for "decent." Just how this would help the matter is not at once apparent. It would certainly imply that the present government is impure. Perhaps in the rarified intellectual atmosphere of Boston, where every hair-brained ism, from Christian Science to astrology, finds a congenial home, it may be instantly apparent that calling a thing indecent "exposes a tyrannical spirit of condemnation," while calling it impure is merely a "Christian rebuke." We shall not quarrel with our critic for choosing to keep his identity secret. He knows better than we do whether his name is one to be ashamed of. The man who writes anonymous letters reveals something more important than his name—the spirit of a coward who dares not father his own words.

van Houten's Cocoa

Known and Prized for its nutritive and refreshing qualities.
A drink for a Prince at less than a cent a cup.
Sold at all grocery stores—order it next time.

—C. E. Millard will hereafter give a part of his time to the giving of entertainments of "illustrated songs." These entertainments are high-class and along religious lines. His address is Maysville, Mo.

—We learn that President D. R. Dungan had a fall last Friday evening which resulted in breaking his left leg just above the ankle. Brother Dungan will have the sincere sympathy of his many friends in this affliction.

—D. G. Wagner closes his work with the church at Lordstown, O., April 7. He will spend a few months near Hagerstown, Md., will then return to preach his farewell sermon and will spend a short time with his parents at Mt. Morris, Ill., before locating in the west. He is seeking a drier climate for his health. The church at Lordstown gave him a fitting token of their appreciation of his work.

—J. E. Lynn, pastor of the Springfield, Ill. church, has for some time been urging the establishment of a second congregation, to be located in a fine residence portion of the city which is practically unoccupied by churches. The membership of the First Church is over 1,100 and is scattered over the entire city, so that a second congregation is much needed. The probability is that a second church will soon be organized.

—The First Church at Lincoln, Neb., has planned to erect a building on one of the most desirable sites in the city. The lots have been bought at a bargain through the aid of the Church Extension Board. The building will cost about $5,000. T. F. A. Williams, Room 55 Burr Block, has been chosen financial secretary and will receive and receipt for all subscriptions. The church has many friends at home and abroad and will welcome their support in this enterprise.

Old People's Home.

The Old People's Home of the Christian Church, organized under the charter of the Benevolent Association of the Christian Church, and controlled by this association, is now permanently located in Jacksonville, Ill., where a very beautiful old homestead has been purchased. Though the old people and all the Old People's Home belongings were moved from the temporary home in St. Louis a month or more ago, the formal opening will not take place until April 9. Here is the invitation from the Jacksonville Board to all the friends of this institution everywhere:

We send you a bidding, both urgent and hearty,
To come to the "Old People's House-warming Party"—
A welcome we fain would extend the newcomers.
So warm that their winters may all seem as summers.
Bring with you, we pray then, some present or token
That will serve as a greeting or fond welcome spoken—
To show the dear Old People here how we treasure
This time and occasion to forward their pleasure;
So bring what you choose—it will be what's expected,
Pound packages even will not be rejected;
For hall or for chamber, bring just what you are able,
For floor or for window, for bed or for table.
And when your life has rounded to lonely November,
And naught of your hearth-fire remains but an ember,
May friends throng around you, their presence confessing
That old age is honored and long life's a blessing;
May they say to you then (as you've said to some other)
"For the sake of my father, the sake of my mother,
And of Him who has said to us, 'Love one another,'
I will hold it a blessing, and claim it a pleasure
To share with you some of life's sunshine and treasure."
So, we send you a bidding, both urgent and hearty,
To come to the "Old People's House-warming y."

The association is owing $4,333.33 on the building and an addition is needed at once. Is there anywhere in our brotherhood one who will make a 20th century gift of $5,000 for this addition? We will accept on the annuity plan or outright. Send a good Easter offering for the Orphans' and Old People's Homes. Now is the time. Send to

WOMAN'S KIDNEYS.

Thousands of Women Have Kidney Trouble and Never Suspect It.

To Prove What SWAMP-ROOT, the Great Kidney Remedy, will do for YOU, Every Reader of "Christian-Evangelist" May Have a Sample Bottle Sent Free by Mail.

Among the many famous cures of Swamp-Root none seem to speak higher of the wonderful curative properties of this great kidney remedy than the one published this week for the benefit of Christian-Evangelist readers.

"You have no idea how well I feel. I am satisfied that I do not need any more medicine, as I am in as good health as I ever was in my life." So says Mrs. Mary Engelhard, of 2835 Madison St., St. Louis, Mo., to a reporter of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

"For more than ten years I have suffered with what the doctors termed female trouble; also heart trouble, with swelling of the feet and limbs. Last summer I felt so badly that I thought I had not long to live. I consulted doctor after doctor and took their medicines, but felt no better. The physicians told me my kidneys were not affected, and while I

Did Not Know I Had Kidney Trouble,

I somehow felt certain my kidneys were the cause of my trouble. A friend recommended me to try Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, and I must say I derived immense benefit almost from the first week. I continued the medicine, taking it regularly, and I am now in splendid health. The pains and aches have all gone. I have recommended Swamp-Root to all my friends, and told them what it has done for me. I will gladly answer any one who desires to write me regarding my case. I most heartily indorse Swamp-Root from every standpoint. There is such a pleasant taste to Swamp-Root, and it goes right to the weak spots and drives them out of the system."

MRS. MARY ENGELHARD.

Swamp-Root will do just as much for any housewife whose back is too weak to perform her necessary work, who is always tired and overwrought, who feels that the cares of life are more than she can stand. It is a boon to the weak and ailing.

MRS. MARY ENGELHARD.

How to Find Out If You Need Swamp-Root.

If you are sick or "feel badly," begin taking the famous new discovery, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, because as soon as your kidneys are well they will help all the other organs to health. A trial will convince anyone.

Many women suffer untold misery because the nature of their disease is not correctly understood; in most cases they are led to believe that womb trouble or female weakness of some sort is responsible for their many ills, when in fact disordered kidneys are the chief cause of their distressing troubles.

Neuralgia, nervousness, headache, puffy or dark circles under the eyes, rheumatism, a dragging pain or dull ache in the back, weakness or bearing down sensation, profuse or scanty supply of urine, with strong odor, frequent desire to pass it night or day, with scalding or burning sensation,—these are all unmistakable signs of kidney and bladder trouble.

If there is any doubt in your mind as to your condition, take from your urine on rising about four ounces, place it in a glass or bottle and let it stand twenty-four hours. If on examination it is milky or cloudy, if there is a brick-dust settling, or if small particles float about in it, your kidneys are in need of immediate attention.

Other symptoms showing that you need Swamp-Root are sleeplessness, dizziness, irregular heart, breathlessness, sallow, unhealthy complexion, plenty of ambition but no strength.

Swamp-Root is pleasant to take and is used in the leading hospitals, recommended by physicians in their private practice, and is taken by doctors themselves, because they recognize in it the greatest and most successful remedy that science has ever been able to compound.

If you are already convinced that Swamp-Root is what you need, you can purchase the regular fifty-cent and one-dollar bottles at the drug stores everywhere.

SPECIAL NOTICE. Swamp-Root, the great kidney, liver and bladder remedy, is so remarkably successful that a special arrangement has been made by which all Christian-Evangelist readers who have not already tried it may have a sample bottle sent absolutely free by mail. Also a book telling all about kidney and bladder troubles and containing many of the thousands upon thousands of testimonial letters received from men and women cured by Swamp-Root. In writing, be sure and mention reading this generous offer in Christian-Evangelist, St. Louis, when sending your address to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y.

Pimples, blotches and all other spring troubles are cured by Hood's Sarsaparilla—the most effective of all spring medicines.

Correspondence.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

Some years ago, in the Christian Standard, I addressed a half-dozen letters, more or less, to a young preacher. It was amusing to hear how many young preachers thought the letters were intended for them! The young minister for whose benefit the letters were written knew in advance that the letters were coming. They were written as a result of face to face conferences in my study over questions by which he was sorely puzzled. He is now one of our most successful men in the work of the ministry. The number who felt that the letters were aimed at them indicated the not inconsiderable number who were passing at the time through the same, or similar, experiences. Some men were so certain that Charles Dickens meant them that the great novelist had more than one suit for libel on his hands.

In my letter in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of March 14, I called attention to exaggerations, all too common, of the number of members in the churches. More than one, as I have reason to believe, after reading that letter, said: "He means me." All right—I mean you if you are guilty! If you say there are 6,000 members in your church when there are not more than 3,000, of course I mean you.

I had in my mind a half dozen congregations. There was no fiction in that letter—not a bit. I knew what I was talking about. The statements made were statements of indisputable facts. The more is the disgrace. No explanation can be made that will effectually cover the case that I had in mind when I was writing. No apology can be offered. It is time to call a halt.

The fact is there is practically no discipline in our churches and there is such a wild rage for mere numbers as amounts to a craze.

My desire is to make this statement as emphatic as possible—for herein is a real peril to the cause of religion in the United States.

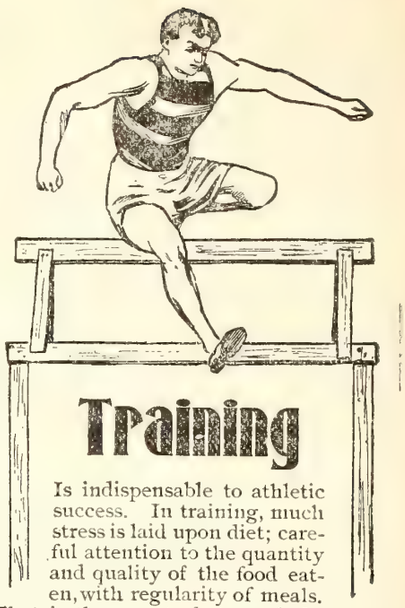
By "our churches" is meant the churches in the United States: Lutheran, Episcopal, Congregational, Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, etc., as well as congregations of Disciples of Christ. To be perfectly frank, my opinion is that the Disciples have something more nearly approaching discipline than the average; but their churches are far from ideal in this respect.

The conditions of admission into the fellowship of the churches of the Disciples of Christ are generally well understood, that is, faith in Jesus as the Son of God and a personal Savior, repentance toward God, an open confession of the Christ with the mouth and baptism in obedience to His command. There is no serious inclination to change our custom in regard to the conditions of admission into the membership of the churches of the Disciples. Let these conditions stand. Such was the custom of the congregations of the saints under the pastoral supervision of men especially inspired by the Holy Spirit—the churches of which we read in the New Testament.

But what are the conditions of continued membership in the congregations of Disciples of Christ? What are the conditions of continued membership in any of the churches in the United States? Must a man be a Christian in any legitimate sense of the word in order to have his name remain on the roster of a Christian church? This question is not meaningless. It is not propounded at random. It is a pertinent inquiry. It is written in this place in all seriousness. An elder in one of our churches said to me not more than three or four days ago: "I have been a member of —— Church for twenty years. I have watched the course of the church closely; I have studied its influence carefully. I look at those who have come into its fellowship during this score of years and I ask: 'Are they any better men and women, morally, than they would have been had they remained out of the church?'" Nor is the brother who puts this question a "sorehead." Far from it. He is an earnest, honest, straightforward man, possessing a high ideal of what a church member should be.

So I come back to the question: What are the conditions of continued membership in a congregation of Disciples of Christ?

Must one abstain from cards, from dancing, from attending the playhouse? Must one tell the truth in business? Must he pay his just debts? Must he keep covenant with his fellow? Must his word in a business transaction be as good as a bond? Must he be a sober man? Can he remain in the church and be a drunkard? "What do ye more than others?" This question was propounded by the Master. It is not wrong, is it, to quote it in this connection? Believe me that, if the names of all intemperate men, covenant breakers, tricksters, men who do not pay their debts, whose word of promise is hardly as good as a legal bond, who spend more money and time in the theatre than they spend in the church, who are more frequently at the card table than at the Lord's table, who go more frequently to the dance than to the prayer-meeting—if the names of all such persons were dropped from our membership rolls there would be a startling decrease in the number of members in our churches. But the churches would be stronger. Why should the name of a man or woman be carried as a member of the church who does not attend its meetings? Who does not participate in its worship? Who does not engage in any way in its services? Who does not contribute to its financial support? But our churches are full of such members—the churches of all denominations.



I would like to receive a letter from every pastor in the United States, a majority of whose members contribute, with reasonable regularity, to the financial support of the church. Do you think that my mail would be considerably heavier than it is at the present time? Why should a man or woman be counted as a member of the church in good standing who contributes nothing to the support of the church and who is able to give? The number of do-nothing persons in our churches, in full fellowship, it is no exaggeration to say, amounts to tens of thousands. The church is weakened by their presence, and they are injured by our treatment of them. We treat persons as Christians who are not. They are deceived thereby. This thing ought not so to be. I plead for a change. Let us get down to bed rock in our work. Omit the vain boasting in which we now indulge and let us strive to make our congregations truly Christian—full of genuine spirituality and Christ-likeness. Then a real and not a spurious prosperity will come to us.

There is more evidence of real progress in the following concerning the March offerings for missions than in all the reports of "revival" meetings that have appeared in our papers during the last three months. Read—

"Our apportionment was $25; offering this morning $38." "Apportionment $100; given yesterday $230, and more to come in." "The church here was apportioned $30. We took the offering yesterday, $60, with more to hear from." "Raised our apportionment, $30, without the least trouble. Several dollars over, and more to come." "We have more than doubled our apportionment." "We took the offering here March 3rd, and it more than reached our apportionment." "More than raised our apportionment yesterday. Five times last year's offering." "Our offering last year was $2, apportionment this year $15, offering yesterday $141."

This is a revival that gladdens my heart. When our churches, generally, come to manifest this kind of interest in doing the Master's will concerning the evangelization of the world the Lord will add to them day by day those who are being saved.

Denver, Col.

That is the secret of strength for every man. No man can be stronger than his stomach. The careless and irregular eating, of business men, causes disease of the stomach and its allied organs of digestion and nutrition. There can be no sound health until these diseases are cured.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cures diseases of the stomach and other organs of digestion and nutrition, and enables the body to be built up into vigorous health by the assimilation of the nutrition extracted from food.

"I was taken with the grippe, which resulted in heart and stomach trouble," writes Mr. T. R. Caudill, of Montland, Alleghany Co., N. C. "I was unable to do anything a good part of the time. I wrote to Dr. Pierce about my condition, having full confidence in his medicine. He advised me to take his 'Golden Medical Discovery,' which I did. Before I had finished the second bottle I began to feel better. I have used nearly six bottles. I feel thankful to God for the benefit I have received from Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. I can highly recommend it to all persons as a good and safe medicine."

Dr. Pierce's Pellets cure constipation.

A Clear Brain and healthy body are essential for success. Business men, teachers, students, housewives, and other workers say Hood's Sarsaparilla gives them appetite and strength, and makes their work seem easy. It overcomes that tired feeling.

Iowa Notes.

F. A. Parish, of Farlin, has accepted the work at Bayard for full time.

L. F M'Cray, who has been holding a meeting at Gilmore City, has concluded to preach for the church for half time and for the church at Curlew the other half.

R. L. M'Hatton is holding a meeting at Scranton. He is said to be one of our best men and could be secured by some Iowa church for a June meeting.

T. A. Meredith is in a meeting at Essex and would like to correspond with some church wanting a meeting. He can begin at once.

The delay in getting the seats has caused the second postponement of the dedication of the church at Selection

Cal. Ogburn is holding a meeting at Gravity. He should be kept busy. If you want a meeting write him at Gravity.

F. L. Davis is in a meeting at Elkon, and would like to be kept busy holding meetings during the summer.

The Iowa churches should not forget American missions the first Lord's day in May. The field is ripe for the harvest and Iowa will be held responsible for her part of the reaping.

Our district conventions will soon be the order. The southeast district convention will be held at Sigourney, beginning April 29th.

W. B. Clemmer, our Bible-school superintendent is sending out an appeal to the Bible-schools soliciting their support in the evangelization of Iowa. The response to this appeal should be so generous that the state convention will feel justified in placing a Bible school evangelist in the field next year.

Iowa is making a good showing thus far this year. During the month of February she led all of the states in the number of additions reported in the papers; the number reached 1,268.

There have been over 800 additions to the Des Moines churches this winter, and the number will undoubtedly reach 1,000 before the present meeting closes. The I. C. C. is setting a good pace also this year. During the first six months of fiscal year, our missionaries organized six churches, four Bible-schools, two Endeavor Societies and added over 400 members to the church. At the rate we are now going we will do at least one-third more work than we did last year. The thing most needed now is money to pay our bills, which can be done if the churches will send their apportionment. If you have not sent in your offering, will you not attend to it at once?

American Brains.

Brain Workers Require Special Food.

American brain workers have for some years past been largely using an especially prepared food for rebuilding the gray matter of brain and nerve centers. Any man or woman who cares to make a test by using this food, Grape-Nuts, for a portion of one or two meals each day, will find a distinct increase in vigor, and particularly in brain power.

Then if they feel disposed to know the reason why, they can have Grape-Nuts analyzed, or take the analysis of the London Lancet and the result will show that the food contains the natural phosphate of potash obtained in a natural way from the cereals, and albumen obtained in the same way.

These two elements unite together in the human body to make and rebuild the gray matter of which the brain, solar plexus and nerve centers are filled.

These are scientific facts which can be ascertained by any careful investigator. The food, Grape-Nuts, is not only the most scientifically made food in the world, but almost any user will agree with us that the flavor is unique and most winning.

"Dogs in the Manger."

An article under this title, by H. C. Patterson, which appeared in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of March 21, has excited considerable comment. Bro. Patterson blamed the officers of many churches for the refusal of congregations to have regular preaching, and said that "where a church has been without a pastor for some time and is inactive, any preacher has a perfect right to push himself in over the heads of the official board and, like the old prophets, thunder the needs of repentance into their ears." We have received several letters on this subject, which we would be glad to print if space permitted. J. F. Callahan writes a little homily on the text, "Beware of dogs":

"Dogs are not always essential but they are often useful domestic animals. They may be useful to man, or hurtful. Dogs are often trained to fight, watch, work, or to be faithful and loving companions. Dogs may be born to bite (beware). Dogs often bark when they should bite, and sometimes bite when they should bark. Dogs are often fondled until they are good for nothing (but to be fondled).

"Application: The church officials may be chosen without the scriptural qualifications. The "must" of Paul is often the "may" of the few brethren just called out, or the preacher calling them out. These may be trained to fight when it is not necessary, or born to bite (beware). Run for the fence! The warning bark of the faithful, working, qualified elder has often aroused the whole church to a sense of impending danger. But the officials often lack judgment, or are so confused by the church or by a small and self-important portion of it that they may bite when they should bark, or they may only bark when biting should be in order, and that sharp, too. The fondled official is caressed and, of course, must caress in return, and if this continue long the church may be but a carcass without the sweetness of Samson's lion. The spirit of the Master is gone.

"In conclusion—still another phase—some opinions differ, why should ours be disturbed 'without money and without price?'"

J. M. Shepherd thinks that the existence of such a condition in "scores of congregations" is a very serious state of affairs:

"But are we prepared to believe that the blame of this condition of things rests wholly upon the church officers of these churches—that they have really made up their minds to act the 'dog in the manger,' and this from the sole motive ascribed by Bro. P., that 'they are too stingy to employ some one, and will not allow one to come and preach lest he, perchance, succeed in taking a few shekels out of the community'? Such is the sweeping imputation charged upon brethren and supposed Christian men who have been selected by supposed Christian people because of their supposed Christian fitness to fill the offices in the church of God. Is it possible that such men could do such a thing for the motive named?

"Where does the trouble lie? And upon whom does the blame rest? These are questions perhaps not very easy of solution. They give room for considerable speculation, and each one will have to be fully persuaded in his own mind as to the cause or causes.

"Were the officers and brethren of these churches never converted to Christ nor taught the principles of the gospel? The evangelist answered in the affirmative when, in his judgment, they were considered capable of self-government, officered and set in order as local churches of Christ.

"Were they neglected by the ministry when, perchance, few in numbers and poor in this world's goods? If so, let the blame rest upon those who claim to have continually as a burden upon their hearts the 'care of all the churches.'

"Was it that their liberality and goodness were again and again abused and imposed upon by designing men who were willing to compromise the church in order to personal or financial gain? If so, let the blame rest upon these.

"Is it that the Church, through its ministry and representatives, its societies, organizations and institutions, has become too commercial and business-like, to the neglect of the spiritual, and that we need reformation in this respect?

"These and other questions suggest themselves and should be well considered before impugning the motives of brethren or assigning the inactivity of many churches to any one cause. God alone, perhaps, knows all the hindering causes to his struggling people here below."

In regard to the preacher's right to "push himself in over the heads of the official board," J. H. Hardin writes:

"I beg to say that I think its teaching is untrue and pernicious. I would not say this but for the fact that there seems to be a growing tendency toward the course here advised. I think it will be a sad day for churches of Christ when 'any preacher' is accorded 'a perfect right to push himself in over the heads of the official board.'

"The evils of inefficiency and inactivity on the part of church officers are not apt to be corrected by teaching that their decisions are to be set aside by 'any preacher' who may determine to 'push himself in.' However great the evils may be, there is a better way to correct them than the course here advised. I doubt very much whether there is to be found any essential difference between a dog in a manger and one out of a manger."

The Optimist.

By B. S. Ferrall.

There's a current intimation
Found most everywhere these days,
That this old world's getting darker year by year;
If it's true, we ought to know it,
If it's false, we ought to show it,
And stand firmly by the statement, without fear.

There are pessimistic people
By the thousands in our land,
Who delight in propagating such a thought,
They are not in line for duty,
They have not an eye for beauty
Such as Christians, who have been divinely taught.

They make dangerous companions,
Their advice is poor at best,
For they're looking on the darkest side of life;
Were I you, I'd not befriend them,
Neither would I courage lend them,
For their atmosphere is plainly one of strife.

They are missing all the sweetness
That is found in Christian hope,
And their lives are dwarfed and clouded—no mistake;
Oh, how sad the end will be,
How intense their agony,
When at last a retrospect of life they take.

I would rather stand with Jesus
In the work of saving souls;
And have height, and depth and length and breadth to life,
Than to stand on lower ground,
And by selfish views be bound
To a hopeless life of misery and strife.

So then clear the way for duty,
Let my manhood take the throne;
Let me have God's word to guide me in the way,
Always doing what I can,
Standing by my Master's plan,
I shall reach at last the land of endless day.

Answers a Question.

Mrs. Rorer's Reply in Ladies' Home Journal.

"I consider coffee as it is usually made in the American family—strong and from the pure bean—an injurious drink, especially for nervous people.

No doubt the student to whom you refer can study better after taking a cup of coffee, but the new energy is caused by a stimulant, the effects of which will soon wear off, leaving him lower in nervous force.

That is the reason he has headache and feels so miserable when he is without coffee. If it is only the hot drink he requires why not take a cup of clear, hot water or a cup of Cereal Coffee?"

Mrs. Rorer is one of the most eminent authorities on food in America. She knows that Americans go on day by day using food and drink that sap their vitality instead of building it up, and it requires argument oft repeated to wake them up. Broken wrecks of humanity stumbling along, unable to carry out their cherished plans, are all about us and their physical weakness is nearly always due to improper food and drink. Coffee is a skilled destroyer of nervous strength. Postum Food Coffee is a delicious food drink made from selected parts of cereals that yield the elements Nature demands for rebuilding the nerve tissue all over the human body.

If it has ever been served to you in a weak, unpalatable drink, have it made over again and use two spoons each cup and know that the actual oiling continues full 15 minutes. Our word for it, the Postum Coffee is delicious when properly made.

In St. Louis.

E. T. McFarland is pushing the work at the Fourth Church. It is reported that the enlargement of their building—a much needed improvement—is practically paid for. Compton Heights tried to tempt the shepherd away from the flock, but they would not have it.

The two weeks' meeting at the First, with T. P. Haley in the pulpit, was fruitful in strengthening and encouraging the faithful and there were a number of additions.

M. L. Sornberger has severed his relations with the Carondelet Church, and will probably engage for a time in evangelistic work. This young church is energetic and hopeful.

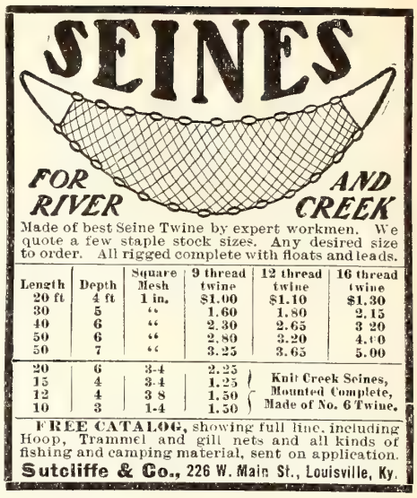
O. A. Bartholomew is spending a few days in Jacksonville, Florida, assisting J. T. Boone. Sherman B. Moore has gone to take up the work in Atlanta, Georgia. There was a large gathering of friends at Compton Heights Church Monday night, March 25, to express a most fraternal and regretful farewell.

J. E. Lynn, of Springfield, Ill., exchanged pulpits with James McAllister of the Central Church, March 24. The latter was engaged last week in a temperance campaign.

Central and Mt. Cabanne Churches have both recently organized a Men's Club. Mr. Abram Ebersole, General Secretary of the Y. M. C. A., addressed the Mt. Cabanne Club March 27, and Miss Josephine Pickerill recited "When Grandma was a Girl." After the business session the ladies of the church served coffee and sandwiches. Most of our churches are organized for children's, young people's and women's work, but aside from the official board there is usually nothing for the men. This is manifestly unfair. More attention to the men from the church will bring more men into the church.

The meetings still continue at Mt. Cabanne. Prof. H. A. Easton received an urgent message from S. M. Martin, engaged in a great meeting at Ft. Smith, asking his assistance there for a week or two and we released him, on the theory that Arkansas is in greater need than Missouri. Mrs. Chas. Green, the popular soprano, has taken his place in our meeting, assisting the chorister, Mr. Barclay Meador. The meeting has not developed any momentum; a St. Louis meeting seldom does. There have been ten additions at the church, and two young men at the Y. M. C. A. meeting, March 24, gave their names for church membership.

Mrs. Helen Bullock, of Elmira, N. Y., national lecturer for the W. C. T. U., and superintendent of Purity, visited our city last week. She succeeded in enrolling a large number of new members, and organized two new unions.



We have a number of business men who are able and willing to preach occasionally. Oreon E. Scott, Barclay Meador, J. Q. McCanne, John Burns, and W. Daviess Pittman are among the number. Mr. Pittman's work is not "occasional" but regular. It may not be generally known that he preaches for the Second Church gratis, and employs Miss Frankie McCarron as a helper. Besides, he purposes to raise money to pay off their debt, and then hold them a good meeting.

W. H. McClain gave a stereopticon lecture before the Evangelical Alliance at its meeting on the 25th, showing the splendid work of the Provident Association, of which he is superintendent. R. D. Smart, of the M. E. Church South, was elected president of the Alliance for the ensuing year.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie's offer of a million dollars to the city for the establishment of a central library building, with several branches, is made on such conditions that it will doubtless be accepted. This is quite comforting, in view of the fact that we are now in the throes of a municipal campaign, with at least four tickets in the field, and the prospect before us of a World's Fair.

The "British-English" New Testament.

It is probable that to many of your constituents the chatty observations of Bro. B. B. Tyler are a delight, affording the mental pabulum they can best appreciate; and in spite of an ever perceptible flavor of omniscience (not much relished by some) his cheery, genial spirit always imparts piquancy to Benjamin's mess.

When I glanced at his letter of March 21, I was glad to note that it dealt with the "Twentieth Century New Testament," because my friend, J. J. Haley, had heralded the book to your readers (in his habitually thought-compelling style); and also because you, Mr. Editor, had several times quoted it appreciatively. It aims to give the thoughts of the sacred writers in present-day English, a good work surely, and one which was greatly over-due. The version of 1611 is too archaic for "the common people" of to-day; and the Revised Version of 1881—through traditional conservatism and theological jealousies—is quite inadequate. Unfortunately, considering the international sweep of the English language, the work has been done by British scholars alone, hence Bro. T. says: "It is not good American English." May I presume to revise his statement? "It is not good U. S. English." Here, in the northern half of North America, it is (to quote the preface) "the every day language," and consequently good "American English." Bros. Garrison and Haley would not be blind to the "English English" of the book: they would most probably regret the fact, as we "Britishers" do; but it did not seriously ruffle them. The case was different with our excellent Bishop Tyler. The ugly and redundant word "got" excited his risibility, and the U. S. hawk—a lovely bird—chased the English sparrow—an obnoxious little "cuss" (U. S.)—from Bethlehem to Egypt, from Egypt to the Sea of Galilee, and finally into Peter's boat. Let me quote (Matt. 14:29-32): "Peter got down from the boat;" which ought to read "Peter stepped off of the boat," as anyone may hear any day in Denver. Again, "When they had got up into the boat the wind dropped," which, of course, is a clumsy British rendering of the elegant U. S. phrase, "When they had stepped onto the boat, the wind quit."

As to the "pigs," a few minutes' lexicographical work will prove that our critic laughs at the more correct of two words because it has been superseded in his circle by its less accurate synonym.

However, if my respected brother forgot the critic's precept,

"In every work regard the writer's ends,
Since none can compass more than he intends,"

I must not follow the bad example of a good man. What then did B. B. Tyler intend? He shall speak for himself. "The gospels in the twentieth century New Testament are funny, and Paul's letters to the churches are warranted to cure chronic inso nnia." There you have it in a sentence! It would seem that Bro. T.'s sole intention was to find something "funny," if so, he has "got" off a two-column joke on the earnest efforts of able and devout men to give to the people the words of eternal life. I was hoping to have "got" ("gotten" is obsolete in British English, so excuse me,) some help towards a better understanding of the best portions of the best book on earth; instead of which I fear that this much-needed work of scholarly Christians has not "got" the fair treatment it deserved. May I humbly suggest that our learned friend accept the very frank invitation of the translators to submit criticisms? And if one of Bro. Garrison's competent aides will take the necessary time and pains (more than for three columns of correspondence) to do a little prospecting for the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, it would open up many a gold field to the more thoughtful amongst them.

The church having been without a pastor about nine months, he gave his attention to the church itself with most satisfactory results. The meeting closed at once with one conversion at the last service. We expect to call Bro. Brooks for another meeting soon.—ROY STUART.

BABY'S COLD

is the way to pneumonia—makes short work of lots of babies.

Scott's emulsion of cod-liver oil relieves it at once; but relief is not cure, you know.

It stops the cough, and gives him a chance to get over the cold; yes, lifts him right out of it.

That's the proper way to say it.

We'll send you a little to try, if you like.
SCOTT & BOWNE, 409 Pearl street, New York.

B. S. FERRALL, pastor.

TRADE I have a magnificent production, consisting of fine art oil paintings, each painting 10x15 ft. in size, covering 8,000 feet of canvas (The canvas alone, if bought to-day, would cost over $1,500). These paintings were painted by a great European artist, and cost $75,000. It took 5 years to complete this wonderful work. These paintings are quickly placed in position, moved by light machinery, easily handled, and make a fine presentation to the audience. It is a drawing entertainment, most pleasing and instructive. People praise the paintings in the highest terms. They are magnificent in the extreme; it is necessary to see them to realize their beauty and grandeur. The subject of this great work is "St. John on the Isle of Patmos," starting with the 12 apostles, life size, going through 52 immense paintings, which are thrilling, most beautiful, and beyond comparison. They can be handled by anyone easily, and bring great profit; a fine opportunity for a splendid income. They were given in the principal cities of Europe, and some in America, 14 nights in one of the opera houses in Chicago; the last night proceeds were $1,159.00. The paintings are in fine condition, nicely boxed, weighing about 600 pounds, checked as baggage with some excess. Splendid advertising with it. I will trade for farm, or town property. First class business opportunity.

F. HOWARD SWEETMAN, Singing Evangelist, Sioux City, Iowa.

Can You Write Shorthand?

DO YOU KNOW that there is a great demand for first-class stenographers? There are hundreds of "business colleges" and "stenographic schools" throughout the country that are annually turning out thousands of young men and women stenographers, and yet there is a constant call for really capable writers of shorthand. There is an over-supply of incompetents, but not nearly enough well-qualified stenographers to meet the demands of the business world, and consequently the young man or woman who thoroughly masters stenography can command a salary of from $75 to $150 per month.

PERHAPS you have thought that in order to become a first-class stenographer, it was necessary for you to leave home and attend a school, at a cost, all told, of several hundred dollars. If you have thought this, you have thought wrong. Many of the most expert stenographers in the country never saw the inside of a shorthand college, and had no other teacher than instruction books. If you have ordinary intelligence and a good knowledge of the English language, you can do as they did.

THE MORAN SERIES of Instruction Books in the Reporting Style of Shorthand is undoubtedly the best system ever offered. It is used in the best stenographic schools in the land. It is Thorough, Complete, Practical and especially adapted for self-instruction. If you secure this series of instruction books, all that is necessary to obtain a complete mastery of stenography is a reasonable amount of study and practice. There are seven books in the series, as follows:

The Reporting Style of Shorthand, Cloth, 312 pages	$1.50
Key to the Reporting Style of Shorthand, Cloth, 104 pages	2.00
The Shorthand Primer, Paper, 32 pages	.25
The Sign Book, Limp Cloth, 47 pages	.25
The Shorthand Dictionary, Cloth, 160 pages	1.00
One Hundred Valuable Suggestions, Cloth, 120 pages	1.00
The Students' Shorthand Manual, Cloth, 144 pages	1.00

Are you a student in some high school, academy, college or university? A moment's thought will convince you that a knowledge of shorthand will be of immense assistance to you, even if you do not intend to follow stenography as a profession. Why not secure these books, and put in the summer months learning shorthand? Are you engaged in business of any kind? Shorthand will save you a great deal of time and labor in the making of memoranda. Are you a preacher? Remember that the best authorities on sermonizing declare that all sermons should be written, whether the manuscript be taken into the pulpit or not. How easy to write your sermons if you can avoid the tedious, finger-cramping longhand!

A SPECIAL OFFER! While we will send any one of the volumes above mentioned on receipt of the price, we will, until further notice, make a special offer of the entire series of seven volumes, complete, for $5.00.

$5.00—The Complete Series—$5.00

This is a generous offer. These books cost far more to publish than the ordinary text-book, because of the special plates required, yet we make a very substantial reduction for the series, which, purchased volume by volume, would cost Seven Dollars. Send for the series, diligently apply yourself, and in three months you can equal the work of the average stenographer, and in six months will be expert. You will find that $5.00 thus spent will be the best investment you ever made.

The Vacant Tomb.

Lisa A. Fletcher.

Ere the purple wings of night
Folded in the light of day,
Shining angels took their flight
Through the misty dawn of gray.

Sat as watchers o'er the tomb,
Touched it with celestial grace,
Thrilled with light the lifting gloom,
And glorified the empty place.

As they swept their shining wings
O'er the garden sweet and fair,
Were there not strange flutterings
In the flower bells blooming there?

Did the birds thrill with delight,
Such as ne'er they knew before,
Song and wing have happier flight
For the angels from His shore?

Breathed the place a holy peace
On that sweet and sacred dawn,
Christ had bidden sorrow cease,
And victory o'er the grave had won.

Love shall sing for aye His praise
Who rose in majesty and might,
That, passing o'er these earthly ways,
We live forever in His sight!

How Mr. Reiley Won His Point.

By M. LaFay Gestrue.

It is not unusual for board meetings to be considerably occupied with opinions pro and con and otherwise. In fact it is often the time chosen for airing opinions and some folks improve the opportunity as industriously as the good house wife strings the bedding on the clothes line for an airing on a summer's day.

Mr. Reiley, however, was not a person who aired opinions. He was a man who smiled at obstacles before folks, but knit his eyebrows over them when alone. He prayed much and read the word of God with a definite purpose. He believed to qualify one's self was a personal obligation from which no one was excusable. Those who knew him best were confident that all his activity was from motives of sincere service, and that he had made a careful survey of every proposition he suggested. His ready answers showed that he kept posted, thought much.

On this particular occasion he proposed that the mortgage of two hundred and fifty dollars on the parsonage property be paid, and he presented several plans.

There are people whose minds seem "all bent askew." You don't know just what they will do! You expect their opposition and generally get it. Minds so dwarfed from habits of inactivity that they are blind to their own ability and miserable judges of others. The mind awake to but one line of thought and action is but half awake.
